No civil-service reformer ever dreams of a civil pension list in this country. It is hostile to the genius of our institutions. Indeed, I see that the Civil Service Reform League, at its annual meeting held a few days ago in Cincinnati, expressly disclaimed by resolution that it advocates the establishment of a pension list. It is true that somebody has introduced into this House a bill providing that a sum shall be taken out of the salaries of Government clerks to make a fund which, after a period of years, shall go to them upon their becoming superannuated; but it requires a singular confusion of thought, as in the case of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON], to be unable to distinguish such a proposition as this from a civil pension. No suggestion is made in the bill to take the money out of the Government funds or to increase the salaries of the clerks so as to make it available. It is simply their own money, their own salaries, which are to create the fund which is to ameliorate their condition in their old age.

I assert that even such a bill as this is absurd and illogical, and that it could not get a dozen votes in this House, and probably not a half dozen votes in the Senate, and that it could not get the signature of the President even if it got so far as the White House. Mr. Chairman, the Government is not a charitable institution. It pays its employees good salaries, and they have ample opportunity to lay aside annually a sum for their old age. If they fail to do this, they must, like any other citizen, suffer the consequences of their lack of foresight and frugality. There is no hardship whatever in such a doctrine as this. How edifying it is to see the opponents of the civil-service law take refuge behind the humanities and denounce the Government that would turn out its faithful employees in their old age. But when did the spoils system have any regard, sir, for the infirmities of body or age? How long did it ever retain the aged or the helpless in office after the capacity for base party services had departed?

The pretense that a species of civil pension now exists in one Department all emanates from a public official who is an enemy to the civil service, and who is doubtless willing just now to excite clamor against it. Secretary Gage assures us that the high-salaried clerks who have been reduced in salaries are amply able to discharge the new and simpler duties to which they are assigned.

Mr. Chairman, a civil pension list is the bugaboo with which gentlemen seek to scare Representatives into opposition to the civil-service law and induce its repeal, to the end that the spoilsmen may take possession of the offices of the country, as they took possession of them before 1883.

But now comes some gentleman and declares that we must have rotation in the civil service of the country, to the end that we may educate the officeholders and send them back to their homes every few years well informed as to the working of the Government, there to disseminate the information so gained among their fellow-citizens. This, Mr. Chairman, is what may be very appropriately designated as the kindergarten argument. Now, this whole argument is predicated upon a total misapprehension of the nature of the public service and the purpose which it is intended to subserve. It is not a place to educate men. We do this in our common schools and our great universities. If the civil service is simply a school of instruction, then let us fill it with those who are the most ignorant, for this class stands most in need of education. Let us also require them to pay the Government for the educational opportunities furnished them, instead of the Government paying them for accepting those opportunities. No, sir; the civil service is a place which deserves and ought to command the services of those who are capable of filling it, and who are therefore entitled to be paid for their labor. It is a mechanism requiring for its successful operation the services of those possessing skill, efficiency, and fidelity, those who come fully equipped at the outset to give full value received for the compensation which is paid to them.

Why should the Government not have the services of such men as this? Why should it have less capable men in its employ? Ignorant labor is always expensive labor. Intelligent labor alone is economical labor. Let us give to the taxpayers of the United States relief from that drain which always comes to their resources when the public business is conducted inefficiently.

But we are told that the civil-service law interferes with the carrying out of party policies; that there are certain confidential offices now under the civil-service regulations which it is absolutely necessary should be taken out in order that the Government may not be embarrassed in pursuing the policy outlined in the platform of the political party which put the present Executive in the White House. Why, sir, right here in the Executive Mansion is an executive clerk who has held the most confidential position within the gift of this Government through several Administrations and who has never yet been accused of betraying Government secrets Right here in the Treasury Department has been that worthy and capable gentleman, the Comptroller of the Currency, who held his office long after the Administration which appointed him had gone out.

Every Administration keeps for half a year or a year or a year and a half, sometimes a little longer, in responsible positions officials appointed by the preceding Administration, which is a confession that such a practice in no wise interferes with the successful management of the Government or the carrying out of the party principles. If such officers can be safely kept in this long, upon what principle would you turn them out later? If the principle can be carried this far, why may not the officer hold for the whole term of the Administration, provided he performs his services faithfully and efficiently? Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in this objection. The President is free to-day to select his own constitutional advisers, and there are no officers which it is essential should be partisans that are required to be selected through a civil-service examination.

Gentlemen complain of the civil-service law because it puts chiefs of divisions, chiefs of bureaus, and chief clerks under civil-service rules.

Why, sir, if there is a class of men in the entire service who ought to come up from the ranks, who ought, by experience, to be familiar with the minutiæ of the workings of the offices, it is this very class of officials that gentlemen insist shall be exempted from civil-service rules. The law and regulations very properly make provision for filling these responsible positions by promotion. A beautiful idea it is to appoint as head of one of these bureaus, or as chief clerk, a man who absolutely has not a particle of information as to the practical workings of the office, who does not know one-fourth part as much as his humblest subordinate in reference to the business of the office, but who sits in his chair a figurehead and draws his salary, with only the feeblest impression as to the direction in which the business is tending.

In other words, the bureau really possesses no official head, but an individual is billeted upon the public without giving valuable consideration for what he receives—in most cases a mere spoilsman who puts in his odd hours disparaging the law and submitting to newspaper interviews for the purpose of creating prejudice against the very system which he is in duty bound to uphold and enforce. Even if the new officer is a person of good general business capacity, it will take him a long time to familiarize himself with the duties of his place, and in the meantime there is a hitch in the machinery, and about the time he gets thoroughly settled in the harness he will be discharged, in order to make place for a new man, and then the whole ground is gone over again, and a constant tendency to demoralization of the public service is thus maintained. I make here to-day a plea to the President for the retention of these men in the places which they now fill, if they have been appointed by virtue of the law.

But we are told that our system creates an aristocracy of officeholders; that it is "monarchical," and is of English origin, and that under it college men alone get the offices. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] made a plea in this direction when he spoke of the civil-service system being in the nature of a "university extension." I want to say to my friend that inasmuch as we possess in this country, under a written Constitution, the power of governing ourselves, it is a matter of the very highest importance that there be a pretty general dissemination of knowledge among the people. This is not so necessary in an absolute monarchy where the masses are not permitted to rule themselves, but are ruled by czars; indeed, popular ignorance under such a condition as this is not entirely without its compensation, since there is no agony half so great as that which comes to an intelligent man from the consciousness that he is borne down and oppressed. But in this great Republic of ours we seek to encourage our schools, our colleges, our universities; and God forbid that the time is come when we seek to put a ban upon intelligence by arguing that if we open the civil service to those most worthy, those who have most intelligence, so that the people can get the benefit of their services, we are establishing an office-holding aristocracy.

But what are the facts? Here are the cold statistics, which take the very life out of the puny arguments of the gentleman from Indiana. They show that but a very small percentage, about 10 per cent, of those who pass the civil-service examinations are graduates of colleges; that a much larger percentage are graduates of the common school. Observe, Mr. Chairman, the present system of civil service affords a stimulus to our great common-school system by throwing open the doors of public preferment to the boys and girls who go there and qualify themselves by study to fill these places. These statistics show also that a very large percentage of those who pass the civil-service examination are men in the ordinary walks and vocations of life. So much for this puerile objection, that intelligence wins and that ignorance goes to the wall.

An aristocracy of officeholders! In what particular, please? In wealth? Why, our officeholders in the classified service are notoriously poor. In blood? Why, they come from the masses of the people, from almost every rank and condition of American life, and are neither better nor worse in point of lineage or claim of lineage than their fellow-citizens. Are they insolent? Arbitrary? Overbearing? Do our letter carriers ever insult or abuse us? Have our departmental clerks ever acted as though they regarded themselves as our superiors? Mr. Chairman, the Government employees are a modest, orderly, and intelligent class of our population; markedly better in these respects than those who were in the Government service under the spoils system, and all this talk about their having aristocratic tendencies is the veriest rot.

Suppose that we did get our idea of civil service from England. What of it? Is not our whole system of government modeled upon the English system? Have we not appropriated her common law bodily? Were not the great principles of constitutional liberty, which are ours by inheritance and adoption, wrought out by English swords and at the sacrifice of English blood, long before we ever came into existence as a people?

Mr. Chairman, the spoils system once had its avaricious hand upon the throat of the British people. The public offices were the perquisites of the nobility, who arrogated them to themselves and conferred them upon a privileged few to the exclusion of the masses of their countrymen. The struggle to establish civil service there was a struggle in behalf of the common people as against this favored class. Its establishment was a distinct triumph for the poor and the lowly, and to-day the deserving son of the sturdy British yeoman sits side by side with the son of the wealthy and influential citizen in the public service, placed there through the enlarged liberties which competitive examinations, under a sensible civil-service law, have afforded. It is the spoils system alone which is monarchical. There is no aristocracy in office save that which it breeds and wants to make perpetual. The civil-service system is the embodiment of democracy, and affords equality of opportunity to all.

Again, it is objected that we establish a different rule for the selection of employees for the Government from that followed in private life. Here is the form of the argument: "Men in private life do not have competitive examinations to select those who are to assist them in their business affairs; they get good and competent men to carry on their business for them by the exercise of their independent judgment; by parity of reasoning the Government should do the same thing. The competitive system is an imposition which you inflict upon the Government, while in private affairs employers are exempted from any such system." Mr. Chairman, in the first place, it is not true that the competitive system is entirely unknown in private life.

There is no grander monument to business capacity than is furnished by the great Pennsylvania Railroad Company. I am informed that this great corporation, which is always keenly alive to the character and efficiency of the men who handle the property and lives of its patrons, has adopted a species of competitive examination and has had it in practice for years, whereby it generally gets the very best men to fill the positions.

But let us see the difference, the lack of parallel, which necessarily presents itself in the two cases. In the first place, nobody ever seeks to impose on the business man in private life, against his personal wishes, an employee who is entirely unsuited for his business, a man who simply "runs the political machine," or whose chief strength lies in having a "political pull" with some influential politician. Nor does anyone insist that if a private employer happens, by some accident, to get a man into his employment who is dishonest or incompetent he shall be obliged to retain him in his service indefinitely.

Indeed, no one ever thinks of dictating to him the selection of his subordinates. He is left entirely free to exercise his own choice, and his self-interest and the necessity for the safe conduct of his business is a consideration amply sufficient to protect him in the selection of his personal employees. He knows that if he selects a man who is dishonest he will be defrauded; that if he selects a man who is incompetent his business will be badly attended to and his individual interests will suffer. Hence he does not make his selection without great care as to the qualifications and the personal character of the employees he takes into his service. His subordinates once obtained, he does not turn a good man out every year or two in order to make a vacancy in his employment for somebody else.

Here, too, his enlightened selfishness and regard for his own interests stand him well in hand, and he keeps his subordinates in his employ as long as they are intelligent, honest, and physically capable of performing the work to which they are accustomed. But look at the other case. How is it with the Government? What is the condition there under the spoils system? Let us assume that a man is placed at the head of one of the Departments by Presidential appointment who has the good of the service at heart. Is he permitted to make a selection of his subordinates upon his own judgment and in his own way and solely with regard to the good of the service?

Not at all. He is not even allowed sufficient time to acquaint himself with the duties of the Department over which he is called to preside, but as soon as he assumes the office a hungry horde of Senators and Congressmen bear down upon him and importune him to fill the places at his disposal with their political friends and dependents, men who have rendered them some party services in return for pledges to reward the services by the bestowal of public offices. In the great majority of cases the men are not qualified to fill the places which are demanded for them. This importunity is continued day after day, in season and out of season. Not infrequently it is accompanied by menace.

The official so importuned has no pecuniary or business interest at stake in the matter. If bad or incompetent appointees plunder the Government, or neglect and mismanage its business, he suffers no individual loss. He simply has his sense of public duty to restrain him, and you know, Mr. Chairman, that he must be a man of iron resolution, indeed, who can calmly sit at his desk and refuse such importunities and not break down and surrender to them after a short period of resistance. But the practice of the spoilsman goes even further than this. If a man is once put into the service who is not competent and is removed for incompetency, a demand is promptly made of the head of the Department that he shall be taken back. "But," says that official, "he is not competent." This response is not satisfactory to the Senator or Representative who makes the demand for the reinstatement of the appointee. Competency or incompetency is to him a matter of secondary importance. "He is my friend," he exclaims to the official, "and you must restore him or I will curtail your privileges. I will oppose the passage of your appropriation." And so the reluctant official reinstates the unworthy employee, and the public interests are ruthlessly sacrificed.

This is not a fancy picture. Exactly these conditions prevailed before the enactment of the civil-service law, and this is why appointments should be taken out of the hands of heads of Departments and the selection required to be made from those previously chosen by a competitive examination conducted by an independent body of officials who are not amenable to such desperate importunities. Of course, Mr. Chairman, the condition was infinitely worse where the head of the Department under the old system was an absolute spoilsman. The departmental examinations then in vogue, known as pass examinations, which at long intervals protected the conscientious official against the raid of the office seekers, in no wise restrained the spoils official from working his own sweet will in the appointment of his subordinates. It was done in about this fashion: The Senator appears with his constituent and says, "Good morning, Mr. Officer. Let me introduce to you my warm personal friend, Mr. So-and-so, who is a staunch member of our party. I must have a place for him in your office." The Senator and the official smile at each other, and the former gives the latter a significant glance which is quite well understood. The Senator withdraws. The examination is commenced.

A few very simple questions are propounded to the applicant, such as even a man of low intelligence can answer, but not sufficient to test his qualification for the place he seeks, and then he is passed into office and carried on the rolls of the public service, and the taxpayers of this country have to reach down into their pockets and pay him for services which he is really not able to properly perform. Even if he is discharged his "influence" is quick to secure his reinstatement.

During all this time, Mr. Chairman, the spoilsman at the head of the Department is there decrying the entire civil-service system. [Applause.] He denounces it as the pet theory of the doctrinaires and says that it is a sham and a fraud and is opposed to the genius of our institutions and wholly impracticable from a business standpoint.

Now, do you want to substitute the pass examination for the competitive examination? Why, the pass examination, as I have said, was tried under the old system and was a miserable failure. That is why it was deemed necessary to pass the civil-service law and have a competitive examination to take its place. The competitive-feature law was born of the very weakness and inefficiency of the pass examination. The pass examination may get a good man if it is honestly administered, but the trouble is that it is not honestly administered. The competitive examination, upon the other hand, is honestly conducted and generally gives to the Government the very best material that can be obtained. It has done it over and over again in these Departments, and to-day, through resulting economy in conducting the public service, the people are being blessed by it in many Departments of the Government.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] cited the case of West Point as a proof of the efficiency of the pass examination, and that it will suffice. What is the matter with the gentleman from Ohio? Is his head completely turned on these subjects? Why, the gentleman seems dazed when he comes to argue this question. His usual strength in debate seems to desert him. He has never touched the heart of it yet; he has simply skimmed superficially over the surface. Now, let us examine the illustration which he advances. In the first place, the analogy fails in that there are but very few applicants for appointments to West Point, and an enormous number of applicants for places in the civil service of the United States. The one is therefore more easily handled than the other.

In the next place, the United States officers who conduct the examinations at West Point are above and beyond the cajolery or the menace of a United States Senator or Representative in Congress. They are secure in their tenure and accustomed to military discipline. They have a plain duty to perform in the examinations, and they go resolutely ahead like soldiers and perform it. It is known in advance that unless the candidate actually possesses the prescribed mental and physical qualifications he will not be passed into the Academy. Hence Congressmen are very careful in making their selection of candidates, and, even with this, time and again the candidates nominated are rejected because of their lack of equipment. This occurred very strikingly in the Fourth Congressional district of the State of Indiana, the district once honored by the late William S. Holman, a man of national reputation. His successor made three successive arbitrary nominations to West Point, each time nominating a new candidate, and every one of the nominees failed in the examination. The nominees of the same Representative to Annapolis were nearly as unfortunate. His first nominee failed to pass the examination; his second passed, but failed at the following annual examination, and was obliged to leave the Academy, and his third nominee had precisely the same experience as his second one.

Mr. Chairman, there is not a man upon this floor who does not know that under the old spoils system this Representative would have procured the admission of every one of these six candidates into the civil service of this Government, and have maintained them there, notwithstanding their lack of qualification. Where is there that high courage and resolution upon the part of heads of departments which will firmly enforce the pass-examination system, which will stand like an iron wall to protect the civil service against the hordes of importunate Senators and Representatives who would demand appointments for their unworthy friends? Sir, it does not exist.

It may not be amiss, Mr. Chairman, for me to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio right here to the fact that the Government does not turn out the graduates of West Point and Annapolis every three or four years and put somebody else in their places in order to give free vent to this idea of rotation in office.

It has also been asserted in this debate that the civil-service law does not apply to any branch of the public service except to the Departments at Washington and to certain custom-houses and post-offices, and that this was the understanding of Congress when the law was passed, and that all extensions of civil-service rules to other offices of the Government that have been made are unlawful. But a few moments ago the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS], in response to the challenge of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], read a statement of Senator HOAR, made during the progress of the very debate after which the civil-service law passed the United States Senate, stating that he clearly understood that while the law was only to be put into operation at the start in certain branches of the public service, yet that it provided right on its face for its extension far beyond that as the experiment justified and the public needs required. Here is something further upon this phase of the question. The Senate Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment made use of the following language in reporting the civil-service bill to that body:

> It is conceded that the party in power must fill the higher official places, which fairly represent its principles and policy, and subject to whose legal instructions the whole subordinate administration is to be carried on. But the subordinates in the Executive Departments, whose duty is the same under every Administration, should be selected with sole reference to their character and their capacity for doing the public work. This latter class includes nearly all of the vast numbers of appointed officials who carry into effect the orders of the Executive or heads of Departments, whether at Washington or elsewhere.

The committee then went on to explain that which is very plain on the face of the law, that it was at first to be applied under limitations, but that it could subsequently be extended readily at any time, and that ultimately it could be made to include all the offices mentioned in this quotation. So much, Mr. Chairman, as to the understanding of the scope of the law at the time of its passage.

The authority for the civil-service regulations of the Government is to be found, in the first place, in sections 1753 and 1754 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which were enacted years before the civil-service act of 1883 was passed, and which are saved and reserved in their operation by the express provision of the act of 1883. Those sections read as follows:

SEC. 1753. The President is authorized to prescribe such regulations for the admission of persons into the civil service of the United States as may best promote the efficiency thereof and ascertain the fitness of each candidate in respect to age, health, character, knowledge, and ability for the branch of service into which he seeks to enter; and for this purpose he may employ suitable persons to conduct such inquiries, and may prescribe their duties and establish regulations for the conduct of persons who may receive appointment in the civil service, etc.

SEC. 1754. Persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty shall be preferred for appointments to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such office, etc.

The authority for the regulation of the civil service is found, in the second place, of course, in the civil-service act of 1883, which upon its very face shows that it applies not simply to the narrow limits to which gentlemen seek to confine it, but to all the appointive offices of the Government except those requiring confirmation by the Senate and mere laborers. I shall not stop to read the law at this time, but simply content myself with citing the second subdivision of section 2 and sections 6 and 7 of the act in support of my assertion, and will insert those sections in the RECORD in the appendix which I shall make to my remarks. The order of Mr. Cleveland which made the great extension of the civil-service rules in May, 1897, of which so much complaint is now made by the enemies of the civil-service law, expressly declares that he makes such extension under and by virtue of the authority conferred upon him by sections 1753 and 1754 of the Revised Statutes and the civil-service law of 1883.

Now, one word about the Government Printing Office. In the speech which he published without delivering the gentleman from Ohio declared that the civil-service regulations had been extended to that office contrary to the spirit and letter of the law. In support of this statement he set out in his speech a copy of a legal opinion rendered to Mr. Palmer, the Public Printer, by some lawyer whose name the gentleman did not see fit to disclose. I confess that I have not made an independent investigation of this matter sufficiently to determine for myself as to the correctness of this opinion. It is enough for me to know that this order putting the Public Printing Office under the civil-service rules was carefully considered before it was issued, that the President who issued it was a lawyer, and that he doubtless had the advice of his constitutional legal adviser—an excellent lawyer—as to the legality of the step he was taking. Upon the weight, therefore, of authority I am bound to believe that this great Government office is properly within the protection of the law.

What, Mr. Chairman, is the history of this printing office? Up to 1861 the Government printing was done under the contract system. The consequence was that one man gave $78,000 as a contribution to election expenses and to partisan newspapers, to the end that he might get the contract. There was so much money in doing the Government printing that he could absolutely afford to pay that price for the privilege. This system was a shameful and expensive one. The work was delayed and it was wretchedly and inefficiently performed. The Government was charged out of all proportion to what private individuals paid for printing of a similar character, and fraud and peculation was the order of the day. Congress finally took the subject in hand. An investigation was had by a committee, and as a result the Government Printing Office was established for the express purpose of getting rid of all these evils and having the public printing done honestly and economically.

But oh, how sad, how unfortunate, was the result! The spirit of spoils, ever seeking a new field in which to disport itself, relentlessly seized upon this new Bureau and never ceased to use it for its unhallowed purposes. I hold in my hand a circular order issued to the employees of the Government Printing Office in 1869. The Public Printer who issued the order was Mr. A. M. Clapp, who, I believe, is now the president of the Anti-Civil Service Reform League of the United States of America. This order shows very plainly that the spoils system produced in that office the same insubordination and inefficiency which is found wherever that system has sway.

I have here also a report made to the Senate July 15, 1870, by Mr. Anthony, from the Senate Committee on Printing, concerning the proper methods to be employed in the conduct of the Public Printing Office, which is so well in point as to the evils of appointing men to office for partisan reasons that I shall insert it in the RECORD along with my remarks.

Here, too, is an extract from a report made by Mr. John L. Vance, from the House Committee on Printing, after an investigation of the Government Printing Office, May 12, 1876, and a resolution adopted by the House to correct the evil reported on the 31st day of July of that year, which I shall also put into the RECORD.

Let me read, if you please, to this House language used by Senator GALLINGER, when he was a member of this body, in 1888, in a report then made to the House by a select committee which had investigated the Government Printing Office, and of which committee he was a member. Here is his language:

The Government Printing Office is a workshop. The only qualifications that should be demanded of the employees are honesty, integrity, and skill. It is no place for politics, and political considerations should have no influence whatever in the matter of appointments or dismissals.

This, Mr. Chairman, is sound, practical, common sense, and yet Senator GALLINGER, who is now a bitter and outspoken enemy of the civil-service law, insists on the repeal of the law, which he knows will result in making political considerations the most potent factor in the organization and composition of the Public Printing Office.

Said Mr. Rounds, the Public Printer, in his report of June 30, 1885:

The Government Printing Office is an immense workshop, and in order to be successful the standard required of the employees should only be skill and efficiency. Their tenure should not depend on Congressional or other influence, and as long as they render faithful services they should be protected by law.

I shall make additional quotations from the report of this officer in the RECORD.

Mr. Chairman, I also hold in my hand the testimony of Mr. Oyster, who, I think, was for years the head of the specification division of the Public Printing Office, a man of intelligence, a man of integrity, one of four brothers, every one of whom served with distinction in the Union Army, a man who has been ruthlessly turned out of the Public Printing Office very recently. He was called before Senator PRITCHARD'S investigating committee of the Senate, and there gave testimony which I shall not undertake to read or quote from, but which I ask leave to put in the RECORD. He testifies to the much greater efficiency of the men who came in under the civil service than the men who came in under the old system. He swears to the enormous number of supernumeraries quartered on the office during the spoils régime and paid out of the public Treasury, in order to comply with the exorbitant demands of Representatives and Senators for places for their friends. He gives evidence as to the inefficiency that prevailed there and the losses which it entailed, and anybody who reads the testimony of this man will, in my opinion, be a convert to any system which makes a recurrence of such conditions impossible.

Our friend from Ohio also complains that the order of the President providing that no man shall be removed from the classified service except upon written charges filed, to which he shall have an opportunity to answer in writing, and a hearing of the matter before the Department head, will interfere with the transaction of the Departmental business. The gentleman's idea is that under this order there must be a complaint filed, an answer made, an issue had, and a jury impaneled to try the issue, and that each party is to have an attorney to represent him and that all this will consume much time. The gentleman knows that such a method of procedure was never contemplated for a minute, and would be both unnecessary and ridiculous.

The purpose and effect of this order is not to keep bad men in office. The law itself, as I have before said, contains provisions under which men of this character can be removed. The object is to stop the practice of dropping men arbitrarily and for political reasons, by requiring the ground for the removal to be alleged in writing, and also to protect employees from removal upon any other grounds that are unjust by affording them an opportunity to be heard in their own behalf.

The rules contemplate simply a written charge, a written answer, a brief but fair hearing by the head of the Department, and then a decision; without any of the complicated machinery usually employed in courts for the trial of matters of fact. Such a simple procedure will answer the purpose of the rule, and yet in nowise embarrass or impede the working of the business machinery of the Department.

Let me call attention to the fact that an order very similar in character to the one in question has been in operation in the post-office carrier service for the past three years, and that it has not impeded that division of the classified service in its work. On the contrary, the First Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Heath, in his report recently submitted, commends the working of the order, and calls attention to the fact that under it the removals have decreased, until now they are only 1.6 per cent of the entire letter-carrier force.

But we are told that we ought to strike down this law because it has resulted in putting more Democrats than Republicans into office. That is not so. Again I invoke the figures and the statistics, and these gentlemen go to the wall. They plant themselves upon a proposition which is not tenable. What are the facts? The system was first introduced under President Arthur, at the conclusion of whose administration there were 15,000 employees covered by it.

Over 13,000 of these had been taken into the classified service without having been subjected to an examination, and nearly all of these were Republicans, because the Government had been under the control of the Republican party for years, and appointments to office had been made along partisan lines entirely. During Mr. Cleveland's first term there were 7,000 employees put under the civil service by him without examination, and the natural increase was about 4,500, making a total of 11,500.

But do you not remember, gentlemen, that about 5,000 of these 7,000 were taken into the classified service by Mr. Cleveland by his extension of the civil-service rules and regulations to the Railway Mail Service just before he went out of office, and that President Harrison held up that order because the Civil Service Commission had no eligible list prepared upon which to draw, and that, as a result, nearly all the men that had been put out of this branch of the service because they were Republicans were restored to their places before the order was allowed to go into operation?

So that by virtue of the suspension of this order, the overwhelming majority of men that were covered into the service by it were Republicans instead of Democrats. Now, under the Administration of Mr. Harrison the increase by extension and without examination was about 8,000, and the increase by natural growth about 7,000. Seven thousand of the 8,000 extension grew out of the including of the free-delivery post-offices in the classified service. All of the employees in these post-offices were Republicans. This extension to the free-delivery post-offices was made just before President Harrison retired from his office. So we see that the overwhelming proportion of Mr. Harrison's extension was made up of Republicans.

Now, when Mr. Cleveland came in the last time there were about 41,000 or 42,000 persons in the classified service; it was overwhelmingly Republican. Mr. Cleveland by his extension put in about 41,000 persons more. This, of course, does not include the number added by natural growth during his Administration. You say that 41,000 is a great number, sufficient to give the Democrats, at least, an equality in the entire civil service. But it does not do it. I stand here to-day to say that Republicans largely predominate in the civil service of the country; and that any statement to the contrary is absolutely untrue. Five thousand of those covered by Mr. Cleveland's broad order during his last Administration were men who had been appointed under a species of civil service introduced into the navy-yards of the country by General Tracy, a Republican Secretary of the Navy. They were mostly Republicans. They were not disturbed by Mr. Cleveland, but were covered into the classified service without civil-service examination.

Secretary Herbert, an honest and capable gentleman, in the last report he made as Secretary of the Navy, called attention to this fact. He said that when he came into office the spoilsmen of his party demanded that he should lift the navy-yard blanket and let them appoint some Democrats, but that he said: "No, I can not do it; those men are in, and if I undo the matter and let your men in it will prepare the way for a similar opening up in the next Administration if it should be Republican; and in this way the civil-service system will be broken up and destroyed."

And this is the all-sufficient answer to the clamor which we have here now, that we shall open up the recent order of Mr. Cleveland in order that Republicans may be put in before the civil-service system is extended. Such a policy means the disintegration and destruction of the whole system. It is the same kind of plea that was made by Democratic politicians when Mr. Cleveland came into power, that he undo the things that Mr. Harrison had done in putting the free-delivery post-offices under this system. Mr. Cleveland refused to do it.

I say again, if those men that were covered into the civil service by Mr. Cleveland in his order of May, 1897, have not the necessary qualifications, all you have to do is to represent that fact to the administrative officers. The machinery of the law is adapted to the case. Simply file your written charges, let the accused file his answer, let a hearing be had, and if the proof warrants it the order of removal will be entered and the unworthy employee rejected. This is the way to remove incompetents from your civil service. There is no excuse or necessity whatever for breaking down and destroying the civil-service law itself, or for retreating from the advanced position that has been attained.

Included in Mr. Cleveland's order, there were also about 5,000 employees in the revenue-cutter, light-house, life-saving, and other Treasury bureaus that had been for years under nonpartisan management, so that the Republican equality was there well preserved. Two thousand of his extensions were Indians in the employ of the Indian Department; I do not suppose they had any politics whatever. Five thousand more of his extensions were to the field branches of the War Department, never regarded as partisan.

Look to the records of the Public Printing Office, which gentlemen now seek to debauch by taking it out from the protecting arms of the civil-service law.

According to its roster, when the civil-service law was applied to it, it contained more Republicans than Democrats—that is, more men appointed by Mr. Palmer than were appointed by Mr. Benedict; and I presume Mr. Palmer appointed Republicans and Mr. Benedict appointed Democrats. So much for the charge that the Republican party has, by the late action of Mr. Cleveland's Administration, been deprived of its fair share of appointments in the civil service.

Mr. Chairman, it is asserted that the law is greatly maladministered and is subject to abuse. Sir, it is one of the purposes of gentlemen opposed to this system to make the people believe by debate here, by newspaper publications, and by clamor on the stump that the law is a dead letter, and therefore ought to be repealed. It is their design to create a popular impression that the evils which sometimes creep into its administration are the result of the law itself, and to conceal from them that these evils grow out of the fact that the law is sometimes administered without regard to its spirit by those who have no sympathy with it.

I affirm again that the law, taken as a whole, is a success—a grand success. It has tied the hands of the spoilsman; it has restrained him; it has reduced the number of offices which can be used to tempt to dishonor; it has given increased efficiency and economy in the administration of the public service. It is only in exceptional cases that abuses have arisen. Find me any abuse in the administration of the civil-service law, and I will show you that it is because the administrative power does not believe in civil-service reform, but is tinctured and inoculated with the doctrines of the spoilsmen, and is directly responsible for it all.

Mr. Chairman, it is a principle of equity well known to all lawyers, it is certainly known to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. GROSVENOR) if not to the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. LANDIS), that every man is estopped from taking advantage of his own wrong. If he purposely and willfully produces a bad condition of affairs, he can not go into the pure atmosphere of a court of equity, and there be heard to complain of it for his own benefit.

These gentlemen who have fought the civil-service system in this country from the very hour of its inception with unrelenting fury and who have dashed themselves against its barrier time and again in furious onslaught only to be constantly repelled and driven back, and who are now making a final and desperate effort to break it down before it has strengthened itself in the mind of the people beyond their power to ever reach it are the very men who have themselves made the breaches in it, of which they now prate so loudly, and they are wholly responsible for all the abuses which have resulted from these breaches.

They have, therefore, no right under the principle I have just invoked to take advantage of the evil which has occurred. But the question arises, What remedy is there for the correction of the abuses which occur in the administration of the law?

I answer, without hesitation, that we must look mainly to the Chief Magistrate of the nation for relief. He has ample power to afford it. "He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed" is the solemn and imperative injunction of the Constitution. He has sworn to faithfully execute his high office, and to preserve, protect, and defend this Constitution.

He should not content himself with commending the civi-service law in his letter of acceptance and in his inaugural address, with expressing a favorable opinion of it in his messages to Congress, and in extending its provisions, but whenever he discovers that any of his subordinate officers are persistently and willfully violating both its spirit and its letter he should promptly take him by the throat and thrust him out of office. [Applause.] If the President of the United States will call his Cabinet together and say to them in plain language, "I favor reform in the civil service; I voted for the civil-service law when I was in Congress; I opposed there the efforts made to strike out the appropriation for its maintenance; I was elected upon a platform which explicitly declares that it shall be thoroughly and honestly enforced and extended wherever practicable,

I have indorsed the law in my message to Congress, and am recognized throughout the country as being heartily in favor of it by the people who are behind me. I hear that the law is being disregarded by some officials intrusted with its administration, and I am earnestly resolved that this shall stop and the law be properly enforced. I ask you to give me your cordial support in my endeavors to discharge my plain constitutional duty, and to report to me any instances of willful violation of the law which may come to your notice, and I will thereupon remove the offending official from his office it would do more to strengthen and sustain the law than all the classifications and extensions that could be made in a century. The prompt removal of some spoilsman from office for abuse of the law, with the distinct declaration by the President that the same penalty will be visited upon others who may thereafter infract it, is the imperative demand of the hour.

There is also a plain duty for Senators and Representatives to perform. If, instead of petty criticisms upon the law, violent attacks upon it, and efforts to secure its repeal, we should give it our sincere support, make complaints to the officials who violate it, denounce their conduct upon this floor, and report them to the President, with a request for his interposition, the abuses that sometimes occur in the administration of the system will cease forever, and the people will experience its full benefits and give to us their unqualified approval.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen are vigorous in their denunciation of the violation of the civil-service law by Mr. Cleveland's Administration. They are indignant because some Republicans were removed and others reduced in grade, solely on account of their politics. They refer to the promotions in grade that were made simply because those promoted were Democrats. They seem to be entirely unconscious that in all of this they are but condemning the system of which they are themselves the advocates. They forget that their system delights in just such injustice. Had the spoils system been in vogue during the Cleveland régime, not simply a few, but the entire force of Republicans would have been ruthlessly decapitated. When the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. LANDIS) assailed Logan Carlisle for his brutal administration in the Treasury Department he but turned his guns upon his own ranks. Logan Carlisle is a typical spoilsman, and the gentleman's characterization of him meets the cordial approbation of every friend of civil service upon this floor.

But what have the gentlemen to say, not of the few that were removed, but of the many that have been retained in the classified service? What of the "spared monuments," which survive the ax of the Democratic spoilsmen, and which, thanks to the protecting influence of the civil-service law, aggregate into the thousands in the various departments of the Government service? Even the number of removals made under Cleveland, Mr. Chairman, are exaggerated. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], for instance, stated in his undelivered speech that 1,200 employees had been wrongfully removed from certain bureaus, but Mr. McAneny, the secretary of the National Civil Service Reform League, in the open letter which he addressed to the gentleman, pointed out that a large number of these employees were not removed at all, but were simple legislated out of office by the laws passed for the improvement of the public service at the instance of the Dockery Commission. The report of the Assistant Postmaster-General, as I have before stated, shows that only 1.06 per cent of the letter-carrier force was removed during last year.

The civil-service report, just issued, shows by statistics that only 8 per cent of the persons in the classified service at Washington have been removed within the last four years, whereas within that period 50 per cent of those in the unclassified service have been decapitated. Why? Because the civil-service law has put gyves upon the spoilsmen so far as the classified service is concerned, and they can not make removals at pleasure. The civil-service law and the force of public sentiment weighs pretty heavily against them after all; but in the unclassified service, which is outside the protecting folds of the civil-service law, the spoilsman works his own sweet will, and as a necessary consequence that service is torn down and disorganized.

They tell us that the civil service has been expensive, and that the law has saved the country nothing from a financial standpoint. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON], a member of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, read here yesterday figures to show that the civil-service expenses had increased. Certainly they have. Why? Because the civil service has been gradually extended from time to time, and this expansion of necessity increases the Government expenditures.

We have to pay for the luxury of government, especially for the luxury of good government. But when it is said that nothing can be saved by the civil-service law, look into the record and read the testimony of Mr. Oyster, to which I referred a moment ago, where he said that if the civil-service law had been in force in the Government Printing Office from its foundation there would have been saved over $8,000,000 to the people. Look at the statement of Carroll D. Wright, the accomplished and accurate Commissioner of the Department of Labor, than whom there is no more competent gentleman to give such an opinion, who was connected with the Census Bureau in its last days, and who says that if it had been put under the civil-service rules there would have been a total saving of $2,000,000.

Look at the report of the Postmaster-General, just out, in which he shows that there has been a great increase in the efficiency with which the mail is handled by the employees in the Railway Mail Service and the post-offices under his Department. Every man knows that efficient labor is economical labor, and a saving of cost to the people.

Look, if you please, at the report of the Secretary of Agriculture for 1896, in which he shows that in three years and a half time, although the business of the bureau was broadened, many men were discharged and there was a saving of $2,066,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BROSIUS. Would the gentleman like a little more time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Just a little more.

Mr. BROSIUS. I ask unanimous consent that he may conclude his remarks.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I think there ought to be some limit, an ample limit. The request in the form in which it is now made makes a bad precedent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Give me thirty minutes, and I will agree not to consume it all. I will not trespass upon the kindness of the committee.

Mr. BROSIUS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed thirty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that the gentleman from Indiana be permitted to occupy thirty minutes in addition to the time already granted to him.

Mr. MAHANY. Will thirty minutes be allowed to the opposition also?

A MEMBER. It has been allowed already.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. One other fact in this connection that is very much in point. The statistics of the Civil Service Commission show, and no man has denied their accuracy, that there has been a decrease in the number of employees in the classified service in the departments at Washington since 1883, and also a decrease in the amount of money paid them for salaries, although there has been a great increase in the volume of business there during that period, but that in the unclassified service of these departments there has been during this period an enormous increase of employees and an enormous increase in the amount paid for salaries. Why? Because under the operations of the civil-service law you secure efficient labor, which, as I have said before, is always economical labor, and you also make it impossible to billet supernumeraries upon the public treasury; but under the operation of the spoils system, which prevails in the unclassified service, you secure mainly inefficient labor and you also unnecessarily multiply places in order to give appointments to the favorites and retainers of those who reward political service by the bestowal of public offices.

Mr. Chairman, the reports of the various administrative officers of the Government have for years contained facts and figures demonstrating the economy which has resulted from the substitution of the civil service for the spoils system, and we know, from the very nature of things, that there has been a great saving of expense.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want, in conclusion, to address a few words to the Republican gentlemen in this chamber. Gentlemen, the civil-service law is our child. Of course it was introduced into the Senate and advocated there by George H. Pendleton, a Democrat, but he was not alone in its advocacy. Leading Republicans spoke for it in that body, and various other circumstances which preceded its appearance upon the statute books fully warrant the assertion that it is substantially the product of Republican hands.

When it passed the Senate every Republican Senator who answered to the roll call voted for it. In the House every Republican who voted, except seven, cast his vote for it. It was signed by a Republican President, and thus became the law. It has been approved and defended by our party press and indorsed by our party platforms, both national and State, times innumerable. Every Republican President since its passage has stood for it and extended it. Republican Cabinet officers and Republican officials generally have commended it over and over again in their reports. The principles of the law have been incorporated into the statutes of many of the States, and many of the great municipalities of the country have adopted its provisions for their government.

The cities of New York, Boston, Chicago, Indianapolis, and New Orleans are to-day operating under civil-service enactments. Many other cities throughout the Union are seeking amendments to their charters whereby they may bring themselves within its salutary provisions. Gentlemen, we should stand for this law here and now. Our safety depends on maintaining it in all its integrity. Let us not lay ourselves open to the charge of hypocrisy. Let it not be truthfully affirmed of us that we are in favor of civil-service reform when we are out of power, but that we are spoilsmen when we come into power.

Let it not be plausibly alleged against us that we favor the civil service law under Democratic Administrations to protect Republicans in office, but that we oppose it under Republican Administration to get Democrats out of office. Let us advocate and maintain the law at all times upon the broad and unselfish plain of principle and from high conviction of public duty.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] says that he is against this law upon two grounds: First, because it is not right in principle; and second, because ninety-five out of every hundred Republicans of this country, if the question were put to them to-day, would vote against it. I want to refute the gentleman's present declaration out of his own mouth. I affirm that while spoilsmen are against this law, and many party workers are against it, yet this great enactment, born of public necessity, is dear to the hearts of the great conservative masses of the American people irrespective of party, and particularly to those who are of the Republican faith. Let me first read you the declaration of the last Republican national convention on this subject. It is as follows:

The civil-service law was placed on the statute book by the Republican party, which has always sustained it, and we renew our repeated declarations that it shall be thoroughly and honestly enforced and extended wherever practicable.

Now, then, is this platform declaration right? Did the Republicans of this county believe in it and authorize it? Did the delegates who adopted it know the state of public sentiment upon the subject, and did they realize what they were doing when they made use of this language? If so, then the gentleman from Ohio is wrong and the American people are behind the law. If not, then possibly the gentleman from Ohio is right and the people are opposed to it.

Now, on the 26th day of February last the gentleman made a speech in this House, and in the course of that speech in referring to the binding obligation of party platforms generally, and particularly to that adopted by the Republicans assembled in convention at St. Louis, he used the following language, which I think is quite pertinent just now. Here is the gentleman's language:

Mr. Speaker: Important declarations in political platforms are never the result of accident, but are always the result of design. They are always born of conditions existing in the constituents of the party that gives the utterance. The Republican convention at St. Louis was a representative body of a great party in the country, and the men who went there and represented their several constituencies understood the conditions at home. They did not go to St. Louis to declare a platitude, nor to make a declaration that was not demanded by existing conditions and that was not in consonance with the opinions of their constituents. * * * It was an occasion that will be a warning to a great many men in this country that they must obey party dictation and follow party standards or cease to be members of that party.

Mr. Chairman, from the GROSVENOR of to-day, drunk with the saturnalia of spoils, I appeal to the GROSVENOR of 26th of February, 1897, in proof of the fact that the civil-service-law plank of the National Republican platform is right, and that the delegates who framed it knew that 95 per cent of their constituents were not against the law, but that, on the contrary, they were overwhelmingly in favor of upholding and enforcing it.

In his speech to-day the gentleman endeavors to break the force of this platform declaration upon the ground that the civil-service question was a minor consideration with the convention, being dwarfed by the tariff and money questions. Not so, Mr. Chairman. The subject is a burning one, and has been such for years. With the spoilman it is the question—never a nonessential. The gentleman was present at the Republican national convention, and he and every other delegate there heard that civil-service plank read, and fully realized its importance and significance. He would escape the binding force, too, of this declaration upon the plea that Mr. Cleveland's famous order of extension of the civil service was not known to the convention when this declaration was adopted, or if known, that the sweeping character of the extensions it made was not realized. But what difference does this make? Suppose these matters were unknown, how could this affect the principle involved? Did not the convention pledge that the law should be "extended wherever practicable?" What, then, had Mr. Cleveland done that Mr. McKinley would not have been obliged to do under the spirit and letter of this platform pledge and declaration? Shall we be heard to complain that he had done for us unbeknown the work that we promised we would perform ourselves?

But, Mr. Chairman, it is not true that the action of Mr. Cleveland, and its extent, was unknown when the St. Louis convention assembled on the 17th of June, 1896. It had been understood for months before that day that he contemplated a sweeping order of extension of the civil-service rules before going out of office. The order itself was made on the 6th day of May of 1896, nearly six weeks before the Republican convention assembled—and the various newspapers of the country had published before that event occurred the fact that the extension was on foot, and its broad and comprehensive character.

Gentlemen of the Republican side, we are told that we must repeal this law to save our party from defeat at the polls. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] said in his speech the other day that if we did not wipe the law out of existence there would not be enough Republicans left to grease an axle at the next election, and that we would lose the Presidency in 1900.

A MEMBER. "Grease the gimlet to bore the hole."

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Possibly he did say that; I don't remember the exact language. Other gentlemen on this side of the House have spoken in the same vein. Mr. Chairman, the member who declares that unless we repeal the civil-service law our party workers will desert us and leave us to defeat simply exposes the damnable character of the men in whose behalf he makes that statement. He paints their character for avarice and selfishness in stronger colors than even their bitterest enemies could possibly employ. He virtually admits that they follow politics solely for the spoils, and care nothing for principles; that the moment the offices are out of their reach they will either sulk in their tents or go over to the enemy.

Now, suppose you tear this civil-service law from the statute books. You say that this will stimulate the party workers to activity. But are there no party workers in the Democratic party, and will they not also be stimulated to activity? Where, then, have you gotten any party advantage by the execution of this infamy—by the base sacrifice of this great principle? It may simply lead to your defeat. But suppose that you triumph at the elections by reason of this ignoble surrender—this system of wholesale bribery—are you then prepared to deliver the goods you have contracted? You have tempted the cupidity of men, you have increased their appetite for plunder. You will have a dozen applicants for every office under your control. You will make in the distribution eleven enemies to where you make one friend. Bitterness and disappointment will be the rule. Indifference will succeed activity. Some will even desert you entirely, and in the next campaign you will go down to inevitable and deserved defeat.

Mr. Chairman, if the matter is to resolve itself into a mere question of party expediency, another aspect of the case. While we are endeavoring to steer clear of Scylla let us beware lest we run into Charybdis. The forces we have most to dread are not the spoilsmen. The people we have to fear are the independent men who hold the balance of power in this country in all the close States, and who are firm believers in civil-service reform, men who do not have to desert their parties in order to throw their influence against us, men who are guided by a high conception of public duty. These are the men whom the gentleman from Indiana characterized the other day as "political guerrillas," and subquently described as an "element not large numerically, but exceedingly active."

The spoilsman will desert us if we do not permit him to rob the public; these men will desert us if we do permit him to do so. There is both a distinction and a difference between these two classes. You can not succeed without the aid of the men to whom I have referred. Do not be misled as to the will of the people in this matter. The men who yell the loudest are the men who are in the minority. All over this country, the professional and business men and the farmers whose sons have gotten into the Government service by competitive examination believe in the civil-service system.

In every great city in the Union, in New York, Chicago, Cincinnati, and New Orleans, there has been rebellion against the spoilsmen and the spoils system. This very debate, sir, will quicken the public conscience and excite the public resentment in every section of the Union. I would rather trust for the success of my party to one loyal man who supports it from principle than to all the Swiss contingent that could be enlisted in a fortnight for its defense. What! the spoils system a source of party strength. Sir, I deny it. It is a source of party weakness. Behold the scene being enacted to-day in the capital city of the gentleman's own State of Ohio. What a sad commentary it is upon the doctrine he has been preaching here. What an object lesson to us all. Where now is the proud party that carried Ohio by 100,000 for Brough over Vallandigham during the war?

Where now is the party of Chase, the party of Hayes, the party of Garfield? Where now is that splendid organization which in the last Presidential campaign swept that historic State from its lake to its river, from the Indiana to the Pennsylvania line, by the magnificent majority of 100,000 votes for the present occupant of the White House?

Where is that party which just two months ago, in an election held in an off year when there is always a reaction against the party in power, and generally because the spoilsmen can not get the offices they desire—where is that party that two months ago swept the platter clean, electing its governor, its State officers, a good working majority on joint ballot in the legislature—carrying the State by about 25,000 majority? "Behold, how are the mighty fallen!" Its spirit is broken; its morale is gone; it is discordant and dissevered; it is divided into warring factions, and is bleeding from internecine war.

Tell me how many bright hopes have been extinguished, how many aspirations for usefulness have died out, how many characters have been wrecked during this unseemly and disgraceful contest! What possibilities for Presidential, Senatorial, and Congressional nominations and renominations have been forever blotted out and destroyed! And all of this for what? Because of some great principle involved?

No, sir, this whole shameful and disgraceful spectacle is nothing more nor less than a conflict over the spoils of office, fed by the distribution of national patronage upon the one hand and State patronage upon the other. Had there been no offices to dispense there would have been no bone of contention, and thus something might have been spared to principle, and everything saved to honor.

I say again that the spoils of office, instead of building up and strengthening a party, are the canker worms at the heart of the party organization, eating out its vitality, destroying its efficiency, and preparing it for dismay and defeat. Yet there are gentlemen here who dare to stand and say that if we do not yield to the clamor of the spoilsmen and repeal this law either wholly or by a system of "modification" which is designed to destroy it by piecemeal the Republican party is going to lose in the next elections.

Sir, the only difference between the man who favors the absolute repeal and the man who favors "modification" of the law is that one, with the frankness and hardihood of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] would put his arms, Samson-like, about the pillars of the fabric, and with one mighty effort pull it to the ground, though he buried himself under the ruins, while the other, with less candor, but with similar intent, would take out a stone here and a pillar there, and thus leave the whole structure to settle upon its foundation and drop into gradual and inevitable decay. The American people understand this. They know what this insidious attack means. The eyes of the people and the party press are upon us here to-day.

I tell you, gentlemen, the surest way to political suicide, the surest way to dig your party graves, the surest way to put this House into the hands of the opposition, the surest way to bring William J. Bryan and the heterogeneous crowd that follow his black political banners into the control of governmental affairs at the election of 1900, is for you to prove recreant to the doctrines of your party platform and to slap in the face that honest public sentiment which demands that the public service shall be honestly conducted in the public interest and not simply for the emolument of the spoilsmen.

Let the offices go. The Republicans had them in 1884, and the Democrats won; the Democrats had them in 1888, and the Republicans won; the Republicans had them in 1892, and the Democrats won, and the Democrats had them in 1896, and the Republicans won. Thus the party which had the offices invariably lost.

Mr. BODINE. It will be the same next time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The gentleman says it will be the same way next time. That depends largely on whether or not we remain true to Republican principles.

Mr. Chairman, all kinds of attacks are being made upon this law. We were told by the newspapers the other day that a trio of United States Senators were so anxious about the future prospects of the occupant of the White House that they gathered themselves together at an odd hour, and walking down the Avenue entered that historic mansion, with their faces full of solicitude, and informed the Chief Executive that if he did not consent to considerable modification of the order of extension made by Mr. Cleveland they would not answer for his political future.

Think of it! The sovereign representatives of States in the American Union, neglecting the study and discussion of great public questions in which the people are all concerned, going, doubtless with as much menace in their manner as there was solicitude in their countenances, to meet the Chief Executive of 70,000,000 people, an Executive whose crowning glory it is that he stands between the spoilsmen and the public treasury, and inviting him to dishonor by informing him that if he does not belie the noblest profession and act of his whole life—if he does not betray the sacred interests of his countrymen confided to his patriotic hands—the probability is that the party machinery can not be so manipulated in his interest as to give him a renomination.

Mr. Chairman, I intend no personal application of my remarks to the distinguished gentleman who now occupies the Executive Mansion when I say that we can never have complete civil-service reform in this country until either by actual constitutional amendment, or by an inexorable public sentiment which will operate as such, the Chief Executive of this nation is made incapable of election to second term.

That President, however lofty and patriotic his purpose and however great his ability, who is ambitious for reelection, is always surrounded by circumstances of temptation and danger. He may know what is right, but he will be often importuned to abandon the right. The plea comes to him, too, from those who are essential to the gratification of his individual ambition, and whom he is conscious he ought not therefore to offend. He is vulnerable alike to those who know how to flatter, and those who know how to alarm. He is anxious to please and conciliate those who control the party machinery. He fears that he can not be returned without their support.

They are sure to demand of him more than he can honorably confer upon them, but they do it so artfully that, blinded by his personal ambition, he is not always capable of seeing the enormity of the exaction. Is there not danger that one so situated may become a vassal—a slave to one dominant idea? Often he will be compelled to choose between the doing of that which will promote his own candidacy and that which will promote the interest of his countrymen. Strong and resolute, indeed, must be the man who, under such temptation and with such environments, can always make the noble and patriotic choice.

If, however, the President is conscious that he can not be reelected, there is no longer any antagonism between his own ambition and the interests of his countrymen. His independence is secured. He is no longer a slave. He need neither fear nor seek to conciliate those who possess political power, and who ask for that which the public welfare requires shall be denied them. Thus emancipated from evil influences he will be animated by a laudable desire to accomplish something for the public good.

He will endeavor to discharge his high duties in such a manner as to deserve on his retirement the popular benediction, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." He will bestow the offices upon worthy instead of unworthy men, and for the benefit of the people rather than for the advancement of his individual fortunes. Such a President will always occupy a high niche in the temple of fame, and dying, leave to posterity a legacy richer than all the gold of the universe.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, after all, the efficiency of the civil service depends mainly upon the Chief Executive and the character of the men whom he appoints to office to administer the law.

Let the President not fear the men who demand that he shall step backward. Let him not yield either to the voice of persuasion or to the voice of command. The people are behind him in this crisis. Never has there been a time in his life when his countrymen looked to him with more anxious eyes than now. Never has there been a time in his existence, not even excepting the dark days when he stood upon the battlefield with drawn sword ready to sacrifice his life, if need be, that the greatest republic of modern times might not perish from the face of the earth, when he possessed such an opportunity to make for himself an enduring fame as he possesses now. The question which confronts us is one which takes deep hold on the consciences of men. It transcends in importance any other question of the day. The question of the tariff, the question of finance, each pales into insignificance before it.

It is a great moral problem, which goes to the very root of our institutions and involves the permanency of our Government. We are called upon to determine whether ours is to continue a representative Government, whether there is to be an equality of the elector before the law, whether we are to have free and fair elections, conducted upon the high plain of principles, or whether our elections are to be fraudulent and corrupt and degenerate into a disgraceful scramble for spoils; for of what utility is the Australian election law if 200,000 offices are to be put up every four years to tempt the cupidity and debauch the conscience of the elector?

A hundred years is a long time in the life of an individual. Few ever attain it. But it is only a span in the life of a nation. Who is so shortsighted and superficial as to claim that we have conclusively settled the experiment of self-government by the people in the little over 100 years in which we have been in existence as a nation? Is there not still ample time for us to fail, for our light to go out, and with it the aspirations and hopes for self-government of humanity throughout the entire world? Can our institutions stand the strain which the repeal of the law will impose upon them?

Mr. Chairman, I pray Almighty God that our convictions of right may not leave us, that our mental and moral visions may remain clear, and that through all the temptations and difficulties which beset us we may be able to discern the path of duty, and that we may follow it with resolute hearts to a safe conclusion. Let us stand by the declaration of the President while he puts aside the politicians and takes hold of the hands of the people.

If the office seekers denounce and desert him, they will take him in their strong arms and throw around him the mantle of their protection. They will uphold and maintain him; and if he does his plain duty in this matter, as I hope and believe he will, they will see that neither his personal nor his political future shall be in anywise impaired because he was true to them and to the principles of the platform on which he was elected. [Applause.]

I thank the House with all my heart for the courtesy which it has shown me and for the attention with which it has listened to my remarks. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. Chairman, before I take my seat I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the record with my remarks, and as an appendix thereto, brief extracts relating to the spoils system and to the civil-service system and their effects, taken from the utterances, writings, and reports of distinguished men and investigating committees; also brief extracts from party platforms relating to the subject, and brief extracts from the civil-service law, together with the open letter of the secretary of the National Civil Service Reform League, addressed to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], and an editorial article from the Cincinnati Commercial-Tribune, and also one from the Ohio State Journal.

APPENDIX.

[Extract from letter of Thomas Jefferson to Dr. Rush, written just before he qualified as President.]

Of the thousands of officers, therefore, in the United States, a very few individuals only, probably not twenty, will be removed, and those only for doing what they ought not to have done. I know that in stopping thus short in the career of removals I shall give great offense to many of my friends. That torrent has been pressing me heavily and will require all my force to bear up against; but my maxim is fiat justitia, ruat coelum.

[Extract from letter of Jefferson to James Madison with respect to the law limiting the term of office to four years.]

It saps the constitutional and salutary functions of the President, and introduces a principle of intrigue and corruption which will soon leaven the mass, not only of Senators but of citizens. It will keep in constant excitement all the hungry cormorants for office, render them, as well as those in place, sycophants to their Senators; engage them in eternal intrigues to turn out one and put in another, in cabals to swap with, and make of them what all executive directories become—mere sinks of corruption and faction.

The only question concerning a candidate shall be, Is he honest, is he capable, is he faithful to the Constitution?

[Henry Clay's denunciation of the four-year tenure-of-office act.]

It is a detestable system, drawn from the worst periods of the Roman Republic, and if it were to be perpetuated—if the offices, the honest dignities of the people, were to be put up to a scramble, and to be decided by the results of every Presidential election—our Government and institutions, becoming intolerable, would finally end in a despotism as inexorable as that of Constantinople.

The tendency has been to revive the dark ages of feudalism and to render an office a feudatory.

[Daniel Webster on the four-year tenure-of-office act.]

I am for staying the further contagion of this plague. Men in office have begun to think themselves mere agents and servants of the appointing power.

* * * Since the avowal, Mr. Chairman, of the unprincipled and barbarian motto that "to the victors belong the spoils," office, which was intended for the service and benefit of the people, has become but the plunder of the party. Patronage is waved like a huge magnet over the land; and demagogues, like iron filings attracted by a law of their nature, gather and cluster around its poles. Never yet lived the demagogue who would not take office.

The whole frame of our Government—all the institutions of the country—are thus prostituted to the uses of party. Office is conferred as the reward of partisan service; and what is the consequence? The incumbents being taught that all moneys in their possession belong, not to the people, but to the party, it requires but small exertion of casuistry to bring them to the conclusion that they have a right to retain what they may conceive to be the value of their political services, just as a lawyer holds back his commission.

[Extract from Parton's Life of Jackson.]

These facts will suffice to show that the old system of appointments and removals was changed, upon the accession of General Jackson, to the one in vogue ever since, which Governor Marcy completely and aptly described when he said that to the victors belong the spoils. Some of the consequences of this change are the following:

I. The Government, formerly served by the élite of the nation, is now served, to a very considerable extent, by its refuse. That, at least, is the tendency of the new system, because men of intelligence, ability, and virtue universally desire to fix their affairs on a basis of permanence. It is the nature of such men to make each year do something for all the years to come. It is their nature to abhor the arts by which office is now obtained and retained. In the year of our Lord 1859 the fact of a man's holding office under the Government is presumptive evidence that he is one of three characters, namely, an adventurer, an incompetent person, or a scoundrel. From this remark must be excepted those who hold offices that have never been subjected to the spoils system, or offices which have been "taken out of politics."

II. The new system places at the disposal of any government, however corrupt, a horde of creatures in every town and county, bound, body and soul, to its defense and continuance.

III. It places at the disposal of any candidate for the Presidency who has a slight prospect of success another horde of creatures in every town and county, bound to support his pretensions. I once knew an apple woman in Wall street who had a personal interest in the election of a President. If her candidate gained the day, her "old man" would get the place of porter in a public warehouse. The circle of corruption embraces hundreds of thousands.

IV. The spoils system takes from the Government officer those motives to fidelity which, in private life, are found universally necessary to secure it. As no degree of merit whatever can secure him in his place, he must be a man of heroic virtue who does not act upon the principle of getting the most out of it while he holds it. Whatever fidelity may be found in officeholders must be set down to the credit of unassisted human virtue.

In a word, the spoils system renders pure, decent, orderly, and democratic government impossible. Nor has any government of modern times given such a wonderful proof of inherent strength as is afforded by the fact that this Government, after thirty years of rotation, still exists.

Always favoring practical reforms, I respectfully call your attention to one abuse of long standing, which I would like to see remedied by this Congress. It is a reform in the civil service of the country. I would have it go beyond the mere fixing of the tenure of office of clerks and employees who do not require "the advice and consent of the Senate" to make their appointment complete. I would have it govern not the tenure, but the manner of making all appointments. There is no duty which so much embarrasses the Executive and heads of Departments as that of appointments; nor is there any such arduous, thankless labor imposed on Senators and Representatives as that of finding places for constituents. The present system does not secure the best men, and often not even fit men, for public place. The elevation and purification of the civil service of the Government will be hailed with approval by the whole people of the United States.

It has been the aim of the Administration to enforce honesty and efficiency in all public offices. Every public servant who has violated the trust placed in him has been proceeded against with all the rigor of the law. If bad men have secured places, it has been the fault of the system established by law and custom for making appointments, or the fault of those who recommended for Government positions persons not sufficiently well known to them personally, or who give letters indorsing the character of office seekers without a proper sense of the grave responsibility which such a course devolves upon them. A civil-service reform which can correct this abuse is much desired. In mercantile pursuits the business man who gives a letter of recommendation to a friend, to enable him to obtain credit from a stranger, is regarded as morally responsible for the integrity of his friend and his ability to meet his obligations.

A reformatory law which would enforce this principle against all indorsers of persons for public place would insure great caution in making recommendations. A salutary lesson has been taught the careless and the dishonest public servant in the great number of prosecutions and convictions of the last two years.

Being desirous of bringing this subject to the attention of Congress before the approaching recess, I have not time to sufficiently examine the accompanying report to enable me to suggest definite legislative action to insure the support which may be necessary in order to give a thorough trial to a policy long needed.

I ask for all the strength which Congress can give me to enable me to carry out the reforms in the civil service recommended by the commissioners, and adopted to take effect, as before stated, on January 1, 1872.

An earnest desire has been felt to correct the abuses which have grown up in the civil service of the country through the defective method of making appointments to office. Heretofore Federal offices have been regarded too much as the reward of political services. Under authority of Congress rules have been established to regulate the tenure of office and the mode of appointment. It can not be expected that any system of rules can be entirely effective and prove a perfect remedy for the existing evils until they have been thoroughly tested by actual practice and amended according to the requirements of the service. During my term of office it shall be my earnest endeavor so to apply the rules as to secure the greatest possible reform in the civil service of the Government; but it will require the direct action of Congress to render the enforcement of the system binding upon my successor, and I hope that the experience of the past year, together with appropriate legislation by Congress, may reach a satisfactory solution of this question and secure to the public service for all time a practical method of obtaining faithful and efficient officers and employees.

In three successive messages to Congress I have called attention to the subject of civil-service reform.

Action has been taken so far as to authorize the appointment of a board to devise rules governing methods of making appointments and promotions, but there never has been any action making these rules, or any rules, binding, or even entitled to observance where persons may desire the appointment of a friend or the removal of an official who may be disagreeable to them.

To have any rules effective they must have the acquiescence of Congress as well as of the Executive. I commend, therefore, the subject to your attention, and suggest that a special committee of Congress might confer with the Civil Service Board during the present session for the purpose of devising such rules as can be maintained, and which will secure the service of honest and capable officials, and which will also protect them in a degree of independence while in office.

Proper rules will protect Congress, as well as the Executive, from much needless persecution, and will prove of great value to the public at large.

Herewith I transmit the report of the Civil Service Commission, authorized by the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and invite your special attention thereto.

If sustained by Congress, I have no doubt the rules can, after the experience gained, be so improved and enforced as to still more materially benefit the public service and relieve the Executive, members of Congress, and the heads of Departments from influences prejudicial to a good administration. The rules as they have heretofore been enforced have resulted beneficially, as is shown by the opinion of the members of the Cabinet and their subordinates in the Departments, and in that opinion I concur. But rules applicable to officers who are to be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate are in great measure impracticable, except in so far as they may be sustained by the action of that body. This must necessarily remain so unless the direct sanction of the Senate is given to the rules.

I advise, for the present, only such appropriation as may be adequate to continue the work in its present form, and would leave to the future to determine whether the direct sanction of Congress shall be given to rules that may perhaps be devised for regulating the method of selection of appointees, or a portion of them, who need to be confirmed by the Senate.

The rules adopted to improve the civil service of the Government have been adhered to as closely as has been practicable with the opposition with which they met. The effect I believe has been beneficial upon the whole, and has tended to the elevation of the service. But it is impracticable to maintain them without direct and positive support of Congress. Generally, the support which this reform receives is from those who give it their support only to find fault when the rules are apparently departed from. Removals from office without preferring charges against parties removed are frequently cited as departures from the rules adopted, and the retention of those against whom charges are made by irresponsible parties and without good grounds is also often condemned as a violation of them. Under these circumstances, therefore, I announce that if Congress adjourns without positive legislation on the subject of civil-service reform, I will regard such action as a disapproval of the system, and will abandon it, except so far as to require examinations for certain appointees to determine their fitness. Competitive examinations will be abandoned altogether.

In his message of December, 1879, President Hayes, referring to the statutes of 1853 and 1855, says:

"These statutes are a decision by Congress that examinations of some sort as to attainments and capacity are necessary to the well-being of the public service. The important questions since the enactment of these laws have been as to the character of these examinations, and whether official favor and partisan influence or common right and merit were to control the access to the examinations. In practice these examinations have not always been open to worthy citizens generally, who might wish to be examined. Official favoritism and partisan influence, as a rule, appear to have designated those who alone were permitted to go before the examining boards, subjecting even the examiners to a pressure from the friends of the candidates very difficult to resist. As a consequence, the standard of admission fell below what the public interest required. It was almost inevitable that a system which provided for various separate boards of examiners, with no common supervision or uniform methods of procedure, should result in confusion, inconsistency, and inadequate tests of capacity highly detrimental to the public interests."

This message further states that under all the limitations and embarrassments incident to a want of appropriations, further trials had been made of the system of open competitive examinations inaugurated under President Grant, both at Washington and in the post-office and custom-house at the city of New York, and to some extent elsewhere; and sets forth their practical effects in the following language:

"In every instance they have been found to be as salutary as they are stated to have been under the administration of my predecessor. I think the economy, purity, and efficiency of the public service would be greatly promoted by their systematic introduction, wherever practicable, throughout the entire civil service of the Government, together with ample provision for their general supervision, in order to secure consistency and uniform justice. The reports from the Secretary of the Interior, from the Postmaster-General, from the postmaster in the city of New York, where such examinations have been some time on trial, and also from the collector of the port, the naval officer, and the surveyor at that city, and from the postmasters and collectors of several of the larger cities, show that the competitive system, where applied, has in various ways contributed to improve the public service. The reports show that the result has been salutary in a marked degree, and that the general application of similar rules could not fail to be of decided benefit to the public service. * * * I deem it my duty to renew the recommendation contained in my annual message of 1877, requesting Congress to make the necessary appropriations for the resumption of the work of the Civil Service Commission."

This recommendation was renewed in the annual message of December, 1880, in the following words:

"I am persuaded that the facilities which such a commission will afford for testing the fitness of those who apply for office will not only be as welcome a relief to members of Congress as it will be to the President and heads of Departments, but that it will also greatly tend to remove the causes of embarrassment which now inevitably and constantly attend the conflicting claims of patronage between the legislative and executive departments. The most effective check upon the pernicious competition of influence and official favoritism in the bestowal of office will be the substitution of an open competition of merit between the applicants, in which every one can make his own record, with the assurance that his success will depend upon this alone."

[President Cleveland on the spoils system.]

I venture to hope that we shall never again be remitted to the system which distributes public positions purely as rewards for partisan service. Doubts may well be entertained whether our Government could survive the strain of a continuance of this system, which upon every change of Administration inspires an immense army of claimants for office to lay siege to the patronage of Government, engrossing the time of public officers with their importunities, spreading abroad the contagion of their disappointment, and filling the air with the tumult of their discontent. The allurements of an immense number of offices and places, exhibited to the voters of the land, debauch the suffrage and rob political action of its thoughtful and deliberate character. The evil would increase with the multiplication of offices consequent upon our extension, and the mania for officeholding, growing from its indulgence, would pervade our population so generally that patriotic purpose, the support of principle, the desire for the public good, and solicitude for the nation's welfare would be nearly banished from our party contests and cause them to degenerate into ignoble, selfish, and disgraceful struggles for the possession of office and public place.

And in his last inaugural address he said:

"One mode of the misappropriation of public funds is avoided when appointments to office, instead of being the rewards of partisan activity, are awarded to those whose efficiency promises a fair return of work for the compensation paid to them. To secure the fitness and competency of appointees to office, and to remove from political action the demoralizing madness for spoils, civil-service reform has found a place in our public policy and laws."

Remarks of Representative William McKinley in the House of Representatives April 24, 1890, page 3803 of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in opposition to the motion to strike out the appropriation for the Civil Service Commission from the appropriation bill:

"Mr. MCKINLEY. Mr. Chairman, in the single moment that I have I desire to say that I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee to strike from this bill the appropriation for the execution of the civil-service law. My only regret is that the Committee on Appropriations did not give to the commission all the appropriation that was asked for for the improvement and extension of the system. If the Republican party of this country is pledged to any one thing more than to another, it is to the maintenance of the civil-service law and its efficient execution; not only that, but to its enlargement and further application to the public service.

"The law that stands upon our statute books to-day was put there by Republican votes. It was a Republican measure. Every national platform of the Republican party since its enactment has declared not only in favor of its continuance in full vigor, but in favor of its enlargement so as to apply more generally to the public service. And this, Mr. Chairman, is not alone the declaration and purpose of the Republican party, but it is in accordance with its highest and best sentiment—aye, more, it is sustained by the best sentiment of the whole country, Republican and Democrat alike. And there is not a man on this floor who does not know that no party in this country, Democrat or Republican, will have the courage to wipe it from the statute book or amend it, save in the direction of its improvement.

"Look at our situation to-day. When this party of ours has control of all the branches of the Government it is proposed to annul this law by withholding appropriations for its execution, when for four years under a Democratic Administration nobody on this side of the House had the temerity to rise in his place and make a motion similar to the one now pending for the nullification of this law. We thought it was good then, good enough for a Democratic Administration, and I say to my Republican associates it is good enough for a Republican Administration. It is good and wholesome for the whole country. If the law is not administered in letter and spirit impartially, the President can and will supply the remedy. Mr. Chairman, the Republican party must take no backward step. The merit system is here, and it is here to stay, and we may just as well understand and accept it now and give our attention to correcting the abuses, if any exist, and improving the law wherever it can be done to the advantage of the public service."

[Extract from President McKinley's letter of acceptance.]

The pledge of the Republican national convention that our civil-service laws "shall be sustained and thoroughly and honestly enforced, and extended wherever practicable," is in keeping with the position of the party for the past twenty-four years and will be faithfully observed. Our opponents decry these reforms. They appear to be willing to abandon all the advantages gained after so many years' agitation and effort. They encourage a return to methods of party favoritism which both parties have often denounced, that experience has condemned, and that the people have repeatedly disapproved. The Republican party earnestly opposes this reactionary and entirely unjustifiable policy. It will take no backward step on this question. It will seek to improve, but never to degrade the public service.

Reforms in the civil service must go on, but the change should be real and genuine, not perfunctory, or prompted by a zeal in behalf of any party simply because it happens to be in power. As a member of Congress I voted and spoke in favor of the present law, and I shall attempt its enforcement in the spirit in which it was enacted. The purpose in view was to secure the most efficient service of the best men who would accept appointment under the Government, retaining faithful and devoted public servants in office, but shielding none under the authority of any rule or custom who are inefficient, incompetent, or unworthy. The best interests of the country demand this, and the people heartily approve the law wherever and whenever it has been thus administered.

The important branch of our Government known as the civil service, the practical improvement of which has long been a subject of earnest discussion, has of late years received increased legislative and Executive approval. During the last few months the service has been placed upon a still firmer basis of business methods and personal merit. While the right of our veteran soldiers to reinstatement in deserving cases has been asserted, dismissals for merely political reasons have been carefully guarded against, the examinations for admittance to the service have been enlarged and at the same time rendered less technical and more practical, and a distinct advance has been made by giving a hearing before dismissal upon all cases where incompetency is charged or demand made for the removal of officials in any of the departments.

This order has been made to give to the accused his right to be heard, but without in any way impairing the power of removal, which should always be exercised in cases of inefficiency and incompetency, and which is one of the vital safeguards of the civil-service-reform system, preventing stagnation and deadwood, and keeping every employee keenly alive to the fact that the security of his tenure depends not on favor, but on his own tested and carefully watched record of service.

Much, of course, still remains to be accomplished before the system can be made reasonably perfect for our needs. There are places now in the classified service which ought to be exempted, and others not classified may properly be included. I shall not hesitate to exempt cases which I think have been improperly included in the classified service, or include those which, in my judgment, will best promote the public service. The system has the approval of the people and it will be my endeavor to uphold and extend it.

[Civil-service rule promulgated by President McKinley to prevent arbitrary removals from office for political reasons.]

No removal shall be made from any position subject to competitive examination except for just cause and upon written charges filed with the head of the Department, or other appointing officer, and of which the accused shall have full notice and an opportunity to make defense.

[Sections 2, 6, and 7 of the civil-service act.]

SEC. 2. That it will be the duty of said Commissioners:

First. To aid the President, as he may request, in preparing suitable rules for carrying this act into effect, and when said rules shall have been promulgated it shall be the duty of all officers of the United States in the Departments and offices to which any such rules may relate to aid, in all proper ways, in carrying said rules, and any modifications thereof, into effect.

Second. And, among other things, said rules shall provide and declare, as nearly as the conditions of good administration will warrant, as follows:

(1) For open, competitive examinations for testing the fitness of applicants for the public service now classified or to be classified hereunder. Such examinations shall be practical in their character, and so far as may be shall relate to those matters which will fairly test the relative capacity and fitness of the persons examined to discharge the duties of the service into which they seek to be appointed.

(2) That all the offices, places, and employments so arranged or to be arranged in classes shall be filled by selections according to grade from among those graded highest as the results of such competitive examinations.

(3) Appointments to the public service aforesaid in the Departments at Washington shall be apportioned among the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia upon the basis of population as ascertained at the last preceding census. Every application for an examination shall contain, among other things, a statement under oath, setting forth his or her actual bona fide residence at the time of making the application, as well as how long he or she has been a resident of such place.

(4) That there shall be a period of probation before any absolute appointment or employment aforesaid.

SEC. 6. That within sixty days after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, in as near conformity as may be to the classification of certain clerks now existing under the one hundred and sixty-third section of the Revised Statutes, to arrange in classes the several clerks and persons employed by the collector, naval officer, surveyor, and appraisers, or either of them, or being in the public service, at their respective offices in each customs district where the whole number of said clerks and persons shall be all together as many as fifty. And thereafter, from time to time, on the direction of the President, said Secretary shall make the like classification or arrangement of clerks and persons so employed, in connection with any said office or offices, in any other customs district. And, upon like request, and for the purposes of this act, said Secretary shall arrange in one or more of said classes, or of existing classes, any other clerks, agents, or persons employed under his Department in any said district not now classified; and every such arrangement and classification upon being made shall be reported to the President.

Second. Within said sixty days it shall be the duty of the Postmaster-General, in general conformity to said one hundred and sixty-third section, to separately arrange in classes the several clerks and persons employed, or in the public service, at each post-office, or under any postmaster of the United States, where the whole number of said clerks and persons shall together amount to as many as fifty. And thereafter, from time to time, on the direction of the President, it shall be the duty of the Postmaster-General to arrange in like classes the clerks and persons so employed in the postal service in connection with any other post-office; and every such arrangement and classification upon being made shall be reported to the President.

Third. That from time to time said Secretary, the Postmaster-General, and each of the heads of Departments mentioned in the one hundred and fifty-eighth section of the Revised Statutes, and each head of an office, shall, on the direction of the President, and for facilitating the execution of this act, respectively revise any then existing classification or arrangement of those in their respective Departments and offices, and shall, for the purposes of the examination herein provided for, include in one or more of such classes, so far as practicable, subordinate places, clerks, and officers in the public service pertaining to their respective Departments not before classified for examination.

SEC. 7. That after the expiration of six months from the passage of this act no officer or clerk shall be appointed, and no person shall be employed to enter or be promoted in either of the said classes now existing, or that may be arranged hereunder pursuant to said rules, until he has passed an examination, or is shown to be specially exempted from such examination in conformity herewith. But nothing herein contained shall be construed to take from those honorably discharged from the military or naval service any preference conferred by the seventeen hundred and fifty-fourth section of the Revised Statutes, nor to take from the President any authority not inconsistent with this act conferred by the seventeen hundred and fifty-third section of said statutes; nor shall any officer not in the executive branch of the Government, or any person merely employed as a laborer or workman, be required to be classified hereunder; nor, unless by direction of the Senate, shall any person who has been nominated for confirmation by the Senate be required to be classified or to pass an examination.

OFFICE OF THE CONGRESSIONAL PRINTER,
Washington, October 1, 1869.

I. It being apparent that sundry disreputable, scandalous, and pernicious practices, indulged in by certain employees of this office, have worked and are still working serious injury to its good order, discipline, efficiency, and fair name, the Congressional Printer deems it his duty to expose such practices, prohibit the same in the future, and warn their authors of the penalty which will follow the further pursuit thereof.

Conspicuous among these shameful practices are tattling, talebearing, backbiting, slandering, lying, and conspiring against those in authority and against one another.

Such practices are hereby denounced as unbecoming gentlemen, good craftsmen, and men of honor; and further persistence in them, or any of them, will henceforth be regarded as placing the offenders outside this honorable category.

By order of

A. M. CLAPP,
Congressional Printer.

Official:

H. G. OTIS, Foreman of Printing.

On July 15, 1870, after an investigation of the Government Printing Office, Mr. Anthony, from the Senate Committee on Printing, made an elaborate report, in which he used strong language in relation to the spoils system, as follows:

"Inasmuch as the Government pays the highest price known to the craft, it seems but fair that it should have the highest class of workmen. Much of the Government printing is of a kind that requires this class of workmen; some of it is difficult, and much of it requires to be executed with great promptness. It often happens that the convenience of the two Houses of Congress requires reports and documents to be furnished in the earliest possible time, and so soon that only workmen of high skill and proficiency can accomplish it.

"This is the class of workmen to whose services the Government is entitled by the compensation which it pays; and in the opinion of the committee the Congressional Printer would be guilty of as gross dereliction as any with which he is charged if he should prefer, in the patronage of his office, men whose claims are partisan rather than mechanical.

"The committee need not remind Senators how often applications for service in the Government Printing Office are made, not on the ground that the applicants are good printers, but on the ground that they are good Republicans. Among the grievances alleged by the complainants in the case before us is that, having rendered good service to the Republican party, they have been superseded by others of inferior political claims.

"However necessary it may be under our system of government to make political orthodoxy a test of office in the usual sense in which the word 'office' is employed, it must be plain that the introduction of that system into the mechanical service of the Government is fatal to efficiency, subordination, and responsibility.

"While in every department of the Government service those who have served in the war for the preservation of the Union should have, other things being equal, a preference, * * * the controlling condition of employment must be mechanical or professional ability; and if any other rule be adopted, the sooner the Government Printing Office is abolished and we return to the contract system the better will it be for the Government."

On May 12, 1876, Mr John L. Vance, from the House Committee on Printing, after an investigation of the Government Printing Office, submitted the following report:

"The internal management of the office over which he [the Congressional Printer] presides is, if anything, still more deficient. * * * Men have been employed on account of their influence alone, while the testimony shows their complete unfitness to earn the wages they receive."

To correct the evils above set forth the following provision was enacted on July 31, 1876:

"Provided, That from and after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of the Public Printer to employ no workmen not thoroughly skilled in their respective branches of industry, as shown by a trial of their skill under his direction."

CIVIL SERVICE.

In my last annual report attention was called to the subject of appointments, and reference was made to some of the new regulations adopted which it was hoped would relieve the Public Printer in a measure from the heavy tax upon his time in the consideration of this subject to the detriment of the more important practical operations of the office. As shown by the present report, the pay roll for the year amounts to $1,767,362.64, or an average per day of $5,646.52. The Government Printing Office is and should be practically a workshop—a manufactory—and the standard required of its employees should only be that of skill and efficiency, and, as in all successful private establishments of the kind, employees, after a fair trial, falling below the average, should give place to others better qualified. In this way only can this office be kept in its proper state of efficiency.

It was the recognition of this policy at the outset that induced me to consider as the main qualifications in the selection and retention of my assistants—the various foremen and assistant foremen—true merit, practical workmanship, and a thorough knowledge of the duties to be performed. * * * Thus have I endeavored to introduce and encourage a practical civil service. I am confident if it was possible to extend this same rule to the appointment and retention of employees generally that the Public Printer could make a record for actual work done that could not be equaled by any private establishment working the same number of hours per day.

The principal expenditure of the office is for labor, and with an average payroll of about $5,700 per day it is important that the highest efficiency be maintained among the employees. The Government Printing Office is an immense workshop, and in order to be successful the standard required of its employees should only be skill and efficiency. Their tenure should not depend upon Congressional or other influence, and as long as they render faithful service they should be protected by law. Their usefulness must be impaired if they are constantly disturbed with the thought that they are subject to furlough or discharge without cause. There is nothing between them and such a fate but careful personal supervision of the multitudinous details necessary to provide material with which to keep all employed and a Public Printer able to withstand the constant pressure for position.

In the interest of the Government the present Public Printer has always endeavored to protect the employees fully in their tenure. He has also adopted such regulations as he could to relieve the office of the pressure for place; but that system which takes so much of the time which should be given to the practical details of the important work committed to his charge is wrong, and should be remedied by Congress. Such action would be commendable, and would result in a better public service.

[Testimony of E. W. Oyster before Senate investigating committee as to condition of the civil service, given in July, 1897.]

E. W. OYSTER, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you reside?

Mr. OYSTER. I reside in this city—1347 Columbia road.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your occupation at present?

Mr. OYSTER. I am a printer by trade, and the position I hold at present is that of foreman, or assistant foreman in charge, of the specifications division of the Government Printing Office.

The CHAIRMAN. You may make any statement you desire.

Mr. OYSTER. Mr. Chairman, I believe the question asked other witnesses is their opinion of the application of the civil-service laws and rules to the Government Printing Office, and whether or not the application of those rules is beneficial to the public service.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what we wish to inquire into.

Mr. OYSTER. Now, so far as the application of the civil service to the office is concerned, I say, from the experience I have had with it and the experience I have had with the civil-service people sent to my division—and I have had a very large number of them, probably a larger number than any other division in the office—that it is very beneficial to the public service and it is a very great improvement over the old system. It would be a backward step, and in my judgment almost a calamity, to overthrow the present application of the civil service to the office unless the office was to be conducted on business principles exactly as a private printing office is conducted; that is, that the Public Printer be left entirely free from political influence. There should be no indorsements by Senators and Members, no pressing upon him people who want employment there, or pressing other people out who are good and faithful workmen; that Mr. Palmer should be left free just as a private employer is left free to say to his foreman, "Now, I put you in this position, and I want you to conduct that room on business principles. I want no favoritism whatever. I want the best possible results that can be obtained by the employment of good and faithful and efficient workmen." I say unless the civil service is to be abolished for that kind of a system, then it would be a calamity to the public service to remove the civil service from the Public Printing Office.

From September 27, 1894, until the application of the civil service on the 1st of August, about 33 or 35 compositors were discharged from my division, and soon after that a call was made upon the Civil Service Commission for printers. They sent in, I do not know how many names, but there were a very large number selected, and I think I got in my division something like 43 or 45 men who came through the Civil Service Commission. A number of those did not come up to the standard and were soon dropped. We did not give them the six months' probation. As soon as I was thoroughly satisfied that a man could not come up to our standard, and that the principle of civil service was not being carried out by continuing him in office, I recommended that he be dropped or dismissed from the service. They called it "dropping" in those days.

After we had sifted the civil-service printers who came to my division, putting them against the same number that Mr. Benedict discharged of the 35 of whom I am speaking. I find that there is an improvement of nearly 54 per cent in the work between those who came in through the civil service and those whom Mr. Benedict turned out. I am not referring to his first discharges now, not to his political discharges, but to the discharges that he made after the 27th of September, 1894. After that time, by putting the men he discharged from that time up to the application of the civil service against the civil-service printers, the records here show that there was an improvement of 54 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the basis upon which those discharges were made? Were they made without respect to the politics of the parties?

Mr. OYSTER. They were made without any regard whatever to politics, but I might state here, because it is an absolute fact, that more than three-fourths of those people discharged were Democrats, and the record shows, I say, 54 per cent improvement. A portion of that improvement is estimated, but 45 per cent of the improvement is on work actually done. In other words, the 33 compositors who came through the civil service earned in the one year, the year 1896, $10,164 more than the 33 whom Mr. Benedict discharged would have earned at the same rate. Forty-five per cent of it, I say, was on actual work done. They actually performed 45 per cent more work, and the quality of their work was a great improvement over the quality of the other. The quality of the work of those who were dismissed was just about as bad as the quantity, and on a low estimate I judge it would cost $50 a year more to have read the proof of each one of those men dismissed than it would to read such proofs as are set by the civil-service printers whom we got through the commission.

I do not want to be put in the position here of saying that there is a difference of 54 per cent between the civil-service people and the whole number of people in the office. This, of course, I can see is taking the very best of the civil-service people—those who were sifted through our sieve and our examination in the office, the practical part of it—and putting them against the very poorest who came in under the old system, but I have no doubt whatever that there is a very large percentage of improvement, even by putting them against the average employees of the office who came in under the old system.

I have a statement here which shows that from 1861 to 1897, since the establishment of the Government Printing Office, there have been about $84,500,000 expended for public printing; that is, through the Public Printer alone, and about 66 per cent of the total amount of money is paid out direct to labor; that is, paid out to employees of the office for labor—from 65 to 68 per cent. I put it at 66 per cent, and that would be $55,770,000 for wages.

The CHAIRMAN. It will take you some time to complete your statement.

Mr. OYSTER. This particular part of it I can conclude very shortly. I can finish in a minute. I put at 10 per cent only what I consider loss to the Government, although I am satisfied that the loss to the Government is very much greater than that by not conducting the office on a business basis, but through political influence and as a political machine. Ten per cent of that would be $5,577,000. The amount left then to have been expended for material would have been $28,730,000, and up to very recent years—up to the time when Mr. Benedict came in the first time—they paid the full market rate for material in the office; that is, they did not get the discount which came to private parties when buying material. Although the Government bought ten or twenty times as much as a private office, they got no discount, while the private office would get 10, 15, 20, and as high as 30 per cent discount.

I calculated 10 per cent of loss to the Government on material by not having proper business methods, and putting the two together there would be $8,450,000 which the Government has sunk by conducting that office, not on business principles, but as a political machine.

The CHAIRMAN. We will ask you to suspend now and to come back at our next meeting. We will adjourn now until Tuesday next at 10 o'clock a. m.

The CHAIRMAN. You can proceed with your testimony, Mr. Oyster.

Mr. OYSTER. As I said at the last meeting, large discharges had been made during every administration of the Printing Office.

The CHAIRMAN. That is admissible, of course. You know that?

Mr. OYSTER. That I know. I have taken the division of which I have charge as a sample. During the administration of Public Printer Rounds, from 1882 to 1886, there were 55 discharges in my division, as shown by the records of the office. Public Printer Benedict, during his first administration, discharged 61 people from the division and 16 resigned. I did not get the number of resignations during Mr. Rounds's administration. During Public Printer Palmer's administration, from 1889 to 1894, there were 69 discharges from the specification division and 32 resignations. During Public Printer Benedict's last administration there were 131 discharges from the division, and 16 of those who came in through the civil service were either dropped or refused absolute appointments. So far during Mr. Palmer's administration there has been 1 discharged, and 12 of the civil service appointees, or those who came in as extras through the civil service, have been dropped or refused absolute appointments. I have the names of all the parties who were discharged during these administrations, and, knowing the personnel of the office very well by years of experience and association with these people, I learned their politics just in the same manner that they learned of my politics—by association and conversation, without any effort whatever to draw people out as to their politics.

Taking the first discharges made by Mr. Benedict from the 8th day of May, or rather, the first discharge was on the 19th day of May (he came in on the 8th), up to the 27th of September following, I have no hesitation in saying—at least, it is my honest belief—that more than three-fourths of those were Republicans. It is for that reason, and reasons like that through all the administrations, that it is my belief they were discharged for political reasons.

In making the first discharge when Mr. Benedict came in, he claimed that the force was very much larger than the needs of the service required and it was absolutely necessary to reduce the force; and my knowledge of the office and its condition would lead me to say the same thing. While a large reduction of the force was necessary, it did not strike me as being necessary that the particular individuals should have been selected for discharge. Certainly some of those discharged during the first six months of Mr. Benedict's administration were among the most efficient employees in the division. I know that they were Republicans, and therefore I assumed that men were being selected at that time on account of their politics rather than on account of their merits or their skill as workmen.

What I say in that regard during Mr. Benedict's administration can be said in regard to the discharges—what were called the wholesale discharges—during every administration. Mr. Palmer discharged 69 people from this division while he was there and there were 32 resignations. Of course, as to whether the resignations were all voluntary or not I have no means of knowing. They are simply entered up as resigned. Out of the 69 discharged by Mr. Palmer the proportion of Democrats was fully as great as the proportion of Republicans discharged by Mr. Benedict during his last administration and during his first one.

Having been chief of the specification division during the greater part of the six months of which I speak, and believing that the discharges were made for political reasons, I desire to say here, as broadly as it can be said, that I made no recommendation whatever to the Public Printer or to the foreman of printing for the discharge or reduction of any employee on political grounds. I have for very many years believed that that system in the office was wrong, and, so far as I had it in my power, I carried out what I believed to be a genuine merit system—a system that I believe to be for the best interests of the Government.

Of course, the figures I give here of the discharges are only the figures relating to my own division. The discharges for the whole office, of course, amounted to hundreds, and I expect it ran up over a thousand. Certainly it has done so during Mr. Benedict's last administration.

The CHAIRMAN. You give only the figures as to the division of which you are now chief?

Mr. OYSTER. That is the division of which I am chief and of which I have positive knowledge. I have the books there. The records for the other divisions I have not, but I know there were large discharges from every division of the office during Mr. Rounds's administration, during Mr. Benedict's first administration, during Mr. Palmer's first administration, and during Mr. Benedict's second administration.

The discharges are often necessary by reason of a falling off in the amount of work. Men are sometimes discharged for good cause, and a reduction of force is sometimes necessary on account of money being short or on account of work being short. But the great majority of all the discharges, as I stated before, were, in my candid judgment, made for political reasons during every administration.

I believe, with that statement, and the statement that I think that system is detrimental to the public service and that the civil-service system is a very great improvement on that system, I am ready now to answer any questions that the committee may desire to ask me.

* * * * * * *

Mr. PROCTER. You have been in the Public Printing Office a long time. From the reports of the different committees of the Senate and House have not the evils growing out of the application of the spoils system to the Public Printing Office been brought to your attention?

Mr. OYSTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. PROCTER. Do you remember any of those reports?

Mr. OYSTER. Yes; I have a number of the reports here. I have read them all lately. I had knowledge of them, and I investigated that matter a good deal. I have made a few extracts from several of the reports of the committees appointed to investigate the management of the Government Printing Office. I have here in my hand extracts from a number of the reports, all condemning, in the strongest terms, partisanship in the administration of the office.

Mr. PROCTER. Will you please give the heading of each report, so that it can be found?

Mr. OYSTER. The first report that I have taken up is a report made July 15, 1870, by Mr. Anthony, from the Committee on Printing, Forty-first Congress, second session, Report No. 264. This report was made after a thorough investigation of the management of the office. I have a few extracts here from that report.

The CHAIRMAN. Just give the page, and then we can get it. We do not need to encumber the evidence with extracts from the report.

Mr. OYSTER. The page I did not take; I just took the Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, give the number of the report, and we can get it.

Mr. OYSTER. It is Report No. 264, Forty-first Congress, second session. The next report was during the Forty-fourth Congress, first session, Report No. 495, a House report. It was submitted May 12, 1876, by Mr. John L. Vance, from the Committee on Printing, after an investigation of the Government Printing Office.

The next report is Report No. 119, Forty-fifth Congress, third session, a House report, submitted by Mr. Hatcher February 27, 1879, from the Committee on Public Expenditures, after an investigation of the office. I have here a short extract from the testimony before that committee which is pertinent to this question. It is the testimony of a gentleman of large experience who had been in the Public Printing Office for a number of years, a thorough, practical printer, who understood and had the experience to know the operation of the old system and its effect upon the public service. That portion I should like to read.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, you can read it.

Mr. OYSTER. It is as follows:

[Report No. 119, Forty-fifth Congress, third session.]

* * * * * * *

"WASHINGTON, D. C., June 11, 1878.

"Committee met. Present: Messrs. Hatcher, Finley, and Burdick.

"M. D. HELM, sworn and examined.

"By Mr. BURDICK:

"Question. Did you state how long you were in the Government Printing Office, and what position did you hold there?

"Answer. Superintendent of the RECORD for the last four years.

"Question. Did your position in the Government Printing Office give you facilities to know how the office was managed?

"Answer. It did, sir.

"Question. How was it managed as to economy, whether economically or otherwise?

"Answer. Then, I think, it was as economically managed as such an establishment can be. I have my own opinion as to that. I do not think, however zealous a man may be in the line of his duty, or how careful he may be, he can manage such an office as economically as he could a private establishment.

"Question. Why?

"Answer. For various reasons. It is a political machine; the appointments are made by political influence. We do not have the best man for the best price always, for one thing. Another thing, a man has no certainty how long he will hold his position. No matter how well he does his duty it does not add anything to his chances for retaining his position. There is no incentive for a man to do his duty.

"Question. Were any more hands employed than were necessary?

"Answer. I could not say positively that there were. I think fewer men could do the same work in a private establishment than could for the Government. However independent a Public Printer may be he can not discharge a man always when he wants to.

* * * * * * *

"Question. Do you mean to say that the Government Printer was subject to political or Congressional influence in making his appointments?

"Answer. Yes, sir; he must be. Nine out of ten persons who are employed are put there through political influence."

The next report I have was made in the Fiftieth Congress, House of Representatives Report No. 3300. This was the investigation of the office during Mr. Benedict's first administration. That committee also condemned the application of the spoils system. I should like to read just a few lines.

Senator HARRIS. You have had a great deal of experience with this matter. Do you think that the present civil-service rules, as there applied, afford sufficient protection to a good and efficient workman in his tenure of office or position?

Mr. OYSTER. No, sir; I do not. That is the defect in the civil-service system and rules.

Senator HARRIS. Is it in the civil-service system itself, or is it in the application of the system?

Mr. OYSTER. I think it is probably in the law itself. At least, from what I have read and the controversies by the commission and other gentlemen, I would assume that, while the civil-service rules put men in, the rules are unable to hold them there in case a public officer wants to turn them out.

I have made up a little diagram here [exhibiting] which shows my opinion as to the different systems. I think the old system is three-fourths bad; I think the civil-service system is one-fourth bad; and the bad part about it is that part where it does not protect a good and efficient and faithful employee after it puts him in.

Senator HARRIS. Let me ask you if in your opinion the difficulty is owing to the fact that the officer in charge can discharge a man without assigning exactly and specifically the reason for which he is discharged?

Mr. OYSTER. That seems to be the weak spot in the law or the rules, or in the enforcement of them—probably in the law itself.

Senator HARRIS. Your opinion, then, would be that if the law was so amended as to require an officer to make a specific charge, to be sustained by the facts and records of the office as a condition precedent to a man's removal, it would be very much better?

Mr. OYSTER. Yes, sir; I think no man ought to be removed from any office without the real cause being assigned for it.

Senator HARRIS. Sustained by the records of the office?

Mr. OYSTER. Yes, sir; sustained by the records of the office. A public officer ought to be able to justify himself by the records.

Senator HARRIS. That, you think, is not the case now?

Mr. OYSTER. I think that is not the case in a number of instances.

Senator HARRIS. It is not the case wholly?

Mr. OYSTER. No, sir; it is my judgment that it is not. I should like to make a short statement in regard to the political complexion of my division. The statement was sent to the committee, I think, that in my division there were 158 Democrats and 46 Republicans. I believe that the Public Printer was misinformed in regard to the political complexion of my division, at least. I can not speak for the other divisions. I do not know anything about them, except generally; but my division has always been known as and frequently termed the Republican colony of the Printing Office. It is conceded, I think, by every fair-minded man that I did not bring politics into the administration of the affairs of my division; that no faithful and efficient workman was discharged for political reasons at any time while I had charge of that division, either during Mr. Benedict's first administration or his last one, and that I always earnestly protested against the discharge of any such persons.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you prepared to make a statement as to the political complexion of the employees in your division?

Mr. OYSTER. I am prepared to make a statement to the best of my knowledge and belief, on the knowledge I have of those people. Knowing their politics just as they know mine, I will say that a majority of the printers or employees in the specification division are Republicans; that they probably had an equal number of Republicans all through Mr. Benedict's administration; that is, the regular employees in the specification room. When large numbers were off on leave, and thirty or forty were transferred from other divisions to take their places temporarily, I can not say just what the relative standing might have been; but take the regular specification-room employees, and I state it as my honest judgment and belief that a majority of the employees are Republicans to-day, and a majority were Republicans on the day the statement was sent here saying there were 158 Democrats and 46 Republicans in the division.

Not only have they been equally divided politically after Mr. Benedict got it settled down—it was not so when he came in—but probably an equal number of those who held what they call the preferred situations in my division—that is, the men getting more than the regular 40 cents an hour, such as proof readers, makers-up, and imposers—a half of that class of employees have been Republicans all through Mr. Benedict's administration. Quite a number of them were selected for discharge. I went to Mr. Benedict with my protest and recommended that they be retained on their merits, just as I recommended that Mr. Marston be retained on his merits, and those people were retained. Some of them would otherwise probably have been discharged but for the fact that I called the Public Printer's attention to them.

General Tracy, Secretary of the Navy, said in 1892, with reference to the effect of the civil-service act:

"The persons appointed under this system are unquestionably more efficient, as a whole, than those selected under any system of pure patronage."

The Commissioner of Pensions, speaking of the order placing pension agencies under the rules, in 1896, said:

"The wisdom of the change has been demonstrated in the increased efficiency of the clerical force and the decided improvement in the entire agency service."

Secretary of the Interior Noble added his testimony as follows:

"The Department of the Interior, with its 7,500 clerks, could not be run six months without the great body of the employees being under the civil-service rules."

Postmaster-General Bissell, in the second year of his term, gave his judgment as follows:

"Another year's experience has served only to strengthen the conviction expressed in my last annual report as to the excellent working of the civil-service law in the Post-Office Department and my desire to see its operation extended to every branch of the postal service to which such extension is practicable."

A few years earlier Mr. Windom, then Secretary of the Treasury, wrote:

"The beneficial influences of the civil-service law in its practical workings are clearly apparent. Having been at the head of the Department both before and after its adoption, I am able to judge by the comparison of the two systems, and have no hesitation in pronouncing the present condition of affairs as preferable in all respects."

Since March 7, 1893, the classified service has been extended until it includes every important permanent position in the United States Department of Agriculture. Reports from the chiefs of bureaus and divisions since this classification are unanimous in praising the enhanced value of the service rendered by their assistants and employees. In efficiency and economy the classification has very visibly improved the work.

The effect of placing the force of the Bureau of Animal Industry within the classified service has been very marked in increasing its efficiency and improving its discipline. This is particularly apparent with the employees stationed at other cities than Washington. The decreased expense of the inspection work is largely due to this improvement in the force. Every person feels now that his standing, retention in the service, and chance of promotion depend upon the interest which he shows and the care and fidelity with which his duties are efficiently performed.

On March 4, 1893, there were 781 persons employed by this Bureau, but on November 1, 1896, there are only 758, notwithstanding the fact that the work has more than trebled.

The force now used in the inspection is competent and efficient, and it should be extended sufficiently to meet the intent of the law looking to the inspection of all the meat entering into interstate and foreign trade. The persons obtained by certification from the eligible list of the civil service, as a rule, have been more competent and efficient than those obtained before the force was brought within the classified service.

The meat-inspection force is now a very competent and efficient one. The inspectors and assistant inspectors are veterinarians, many of whom have passed a rigid examination under the Civil Service Commission, and the greater part of the nonprofessional members of the force have had such long experience that their services are extremely valuable. The persons obtained by certification from the eligible list of the Civil Service Commission have, as a rule, been more competent and efficient than those obtained before the force was brought within the classified service, and it has been possible to maintain much better discipline than was the case when a considerable proportion of the force believed that they had influence, which made them more or less independent of the head of the Department and the Chief of the Bureau.

When your Administration began there was in operation a system of civil-service rules for the employment of labor at navy-yards which was working smoothly and had commended itself generally to the officials having these stations in charge. Those rules had been devised by my predecessor, Secretary Tracy. They were carefully drawn, with a manifest intention that no personal preferences or partisan considerations should obtain in the employment of labor. The fact remained, however, that up to the moment of the adoption of these rules the old system, under which such preferences and considerations always obtained, had existed at all the yards.

When the new rules were adopted they necessarily covered and kept in place present employees. No tests were, or indeed could well be, applied to them. The result was that a large majority of the employees covered by the rules were members of the political party then in power. Foremen, it is true, were, upon the adoption of the rules in September, 1891, required to submit to examinations in competition with outsiders, but as proven capacity in the management of men, gained by experience in their places, necessarily counted for much in their examinations, most of these foremen retained their positions. The result, therefore, was that the new system began to operate with a very decided majority of foremen, quartermen, leading men, and other employees in place belonging to one political party.

These considerations were very earnestly and repeatedly pressed upon me in 1893 as reasons why I should disregard the rules, or at least abrogate them, until the representation of political parties in the yards should be equalized. It was contended, too, with much show of truth, that laborers of the party to which I belonged, believing the rules to be but a sham, had failed to register for places. I did not fail to see the force of these arguments; but, on the other hand, it was to be considered that if such a system was ever to be in force it must have a beginning, and that if the first Secretary coming in after the adoption of rules against which the only objection was present inequality of political representation should attempt equalization from his standpoint every succeeding Secretary would have excuse for taking his bite at the cheese, and so the prospect would be that the whole system would be eventually nibbled away to nothing. It was therefore determined, with your full concurrence, that for the good of the Government the system should be adhered to, and this course has been pursued faithfully.

If there be any point at which the Government of the United States is entitled to the very best service that can be had, where men should get work because they are capable of doing it, and should retain employment only because they discharge their duties faithfully, it is in the navy-yards, where ships are built and repaired that are to go forth on the high seas freighted with precious lives and carrying the flag that symbolizes the might and majesty of our country. There can be no comparison between a navy-yard system that holds out every inducement to good conduct and excellence in workmanship and another in which a controlling consideration in the procurement of work and the retention of place is political influence. Every naval officer whose duties have brought him during the past six years in contact with the laborers at our Government yards will, I am sure, testify to the immeasurable superiority of the present over the old system. To the maintenance and betterment of this system I have devoted much of my time and thought during these four years in the earnest hope that the labors of Secretary Tracy in this behalf, supplemented by my own, will result in ingrafting it permanently in the service of the naval establishment.

Of the complaints which have come to the Department, charging favoritism in the employment, promotion, reduction, dismissal, or grading of employees at navy-yards, hardly one has proved to be well grounded, although careful and extended investigation has been had, the complainants in some cases being represented by counsel. This demonstrates, as well perhaps as anything could, the merit of the present system.

On the 1st day of July, 1895, by Executive order, the clerks in the pension agencies were placed under civil-service rules.

The wisdom of the change has been demonstrated in the increased efficiency of the clerical force and decided improvement in the entire agency service.

[From the report of the Postmaster-General.]

I believe that in this, my last report, I can truthfully affirm that the heads of the several bureaus of this Department have manifested their ability and have done their work in this spirit, and that as a consequence the United States postal service, with all the drawbacks of defective laws and an outgrown organization to which I have referred, was never so efficient as it is to-day. With the gradual inclusion of its employees in the classified civil service, in which reform the President's order of May 6, 1893, has made another step, it is becoming less and less a political machine and more and more a strictly business establishment.

[From the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.]

The recognition of the merit system in the Indian service is a long step forward, and will undoubtedly elevate its standard, improve its morale, and promote its efficiency. The removal of all partisan influence from appointments will give added dignity to the positions and increase the zeal of those engaged in the work.

[From the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.]

I desire to call special attention to the marked improvement of the service in the field since the classification under the civil-service law of the various employees in that branch of the service. This is especially noticeable in those districts in which there has heretofore been a disposition on the part of subordinate employees to enter into collusion with persons engaged in the illicit manufacture and sale of distilled spirits.

Under the old order of things the subordinate employee looked forward to nothing better than his employment at a small compensation during the period of his assignment to duty at a distillery. As a result, he frequently became careless in the discharge of his duties, and in some cases sought to increase his income by actual collusion with the distiller to whose premises he was assigned, such collusion having for its object the defrauding of the Government of its revenues.

Under present conditions the employee has learned that a serious infraction of his duty renders him liable to peremptory dismissal from the service, and that without any hope of reemployment. He has also learned that a strict compliance on his part with the law and regulations will place him in the line of promotion and enable him to be advanced to the higher grades of the service.

In the districts referred to the improved condition of the service is evidenced by the greatly decreased number of complaints filed with this office, and also, by the largely increased receipts from penalties imposed for violations of the law and regulations.

[Extract from an address of Hon. Carl Schurz, delivered at the annual meeting of the National Civil Service Reform League of the United States, December 12, 1895.]

Let us picture to ourselves a candidate for Congress in a large district and follow him in his career—a man of good character, fine abilities, and with an honorable ambition to serve his country. It is the year of a Presidential election, with a new deal of patronage in prospect. First, he has to get the nomination from his party convention. He enjoys the good will and respect of his neighbors but he finds that this is not enough. The primaries which elect delegates to the Congressional district convention are in many cases controlled by the most adroit and pushing politicians, who want office and are especially keen when a change of Administration is impending. Our candidate finds that to beat his rivals for the nomination he will need the aid of some of those alert politicians, and, in turn, they let him know what places he is to procure for them if elected. The candidate being once started, and, of course, anxious to succeed, tries to persuade himself that such things are always done, and that there is really no harm in opening a prospective reward to persons willing to render the country the valuable service of making him a member of Congress. Still he recoils from the thought of making a downright bargain for his nomination.

Morally, he can not afford to purchase his nomination with a promise of office. Neither can he afford, he thinks, to lose his nomination by bluntly refusing the promise. He begins to compromise with his conscience and honor, and calls up his diplomatic adroitness, answering the demand for office in ambiguous phrase. He will "take the matter into favorable consideration;" he will "do the fair thing;" he smiles, he winks, he nods, having not yet learned by experience that all these things are taken by the place-hunter as positive promise, no matter what his own mental reservations may be, and thus he is, without knowing it, soon deeply mortgaged, having, perhaps, in this vague way promised the same office to several people, and such promises are sure to be presented for redemption.

Well, he is nominated, and now the campaign begins. The district threatens to be close and he looks for help. That help is freely offered. Some men take a sincere interest in the cause the candidate stands for and give him their aid unselfishly. Others, who are effective local stump speakers, or whose influence can reach some particular class of people, or who can disarm certain opposition by personal work, or who are just the men to get out the vote, or who can do great good by the wise expenditure of some money, and so on, are of opinion that they should not be expected to "hustle about" for nothing. He accepts their services, and this gives them "claims" upon him—claims to be satisfied, of course, with offices. Carried away by the heat of the struggle, he not merely continues to open prospects by vague speech, and to smile and wink and nod, but he makes positive pledges, perhaps not a few of them. The mortgages rise to a formidable amount.

The election comes and he triumphs. His bosom swells with the proud consciousness of honors won and of distinction to be achieved in the service of his country. Being a man of honorable purpose he thinks of going to work at once to prepare himself for his legislative duties, the importance of which he earnestly appreciates. To these duties he wishes wholly to devote himself. But no; he has not yet time for that. Other more pressing business intervenes. His mail is heavy with petitions and recommendations for office, bearing long strings of names in favor of men of whom he may never have heard—covering all the Federal appointments in his district many times over. Estimable men whom he can not afford to offend seek places for their friends and dependents. But by the men who have "claims" upon him he is most strongly reminded that first of all his time and labor belong to his "friends."

There will be a change of Administration and, of course, vacant places without limit. In the first place it is to be taken for granted that, according to custom, he will have all the post-offices in his district at his disposal. Then it is suggested that he should consider it a duty of honor to fill some consulships from his district, if not even a foreign mission. And indeed there are gentlemen among his constituents who, having done valiant battle for him, now think that foreign air would do good to them and their wives, and that their daughters should have first-class music lessons abroad. Then there are others who maintain that they have fairly earned Indian agencies, or revenue positions, or places as chiefs of bureaus, or, at least, of divisions in some Department at Washington. They and their friends all insist that the new member of Congress is in honor bound to procure them these things; that he certainly can do it if he will; that it will cost him only a word, and that if he fails to do it, his party in the district will suffer grievously, and he himself in particular.

About the time the new President goes into power our new Congressman, loaded with petitions and recommendations, rushes on to Washington to plunge into that fearful spoils carnival called a change of Administration.

He travels in lively company; not a few of his constituents who hold, or believe they hold, his promises go with him to keep him to his work, each expecting him to make his case a special one. The poor man's first night in Washington is troubled with disquieting visions. Has he not seen among his traveling company Smith, to whom he during the campaign opened a prospect for the postmastership at Blankville, while he had positively promised that postmastership to Jones? And here they are both in bodily presence, each anxious to close the final mortgage each holds on the same piece of property.

Our new member of Congress has always considered himself a man of integrity and honor. He now instinctively feels that he is in a situation in which a gentleman ought not to be. Has he not done a thing which a gentleman ought not to do? It is often the case that we become for the first time clearly conscious of the true nature of an offense when we have to confront its consequences.

But our friend has hardly time for self-reproach. How can he get rid of the conflict of claims between Smith and Jones? Both are influential constituents whom it would be dangerous to offend. Smith is perhaps the better man for that post-office, but Jones holds the clearer promise. Our friend concludes that the clearer promise must be kept; that he will explain his embarrassment to Smith, ask Smith to give way to Jones, and tell Smith that he shall have "something equally as good," as the current phrase is. Ah, poor man, he has to learn yet what a terrible scourge he has prepared for his back by that promise of "something equally as good," for Smith will faithfully stay by his side until he gets it.

And a good many other expectant constituents will stay likewise. Wherever our unfortunate statesman is, they are. They are there when he goes to bed late at night, they are there before he gets up in the morning. There are the Joneses calling for their post-offices, the Smiths demanding "something equally as good," and many others "claiming" many other things, and all these things without delay. Our friend, his political creditors at his heels, rushes first to the general Post-Office Department to satisfy his Joneses. There he finds the rooms and corridors thronged with other statesmen and their friends, crowds of Joneses and Smiths. The same anxious faces, the same eager eyes, the same nervously twitching lips, the same pictures of misery. After hours of restless waiting he succeeds in being listened to about the post-office in Blankville, the papers covering that place are sent for, and our friend is blandly informed that there is no vacancy in that post-office. "What," exclaims our Congressman, "no vacancy? Why, of course, you will make one. Remove the incumbent. I must have that place. I have promised it to Mr. Jones, this meritorious friend of mine." The answer comes, calm and cruel: "The present postmaster has been in about two years. His record as an officer is excellent. There have never been any charges against him. There is absolutely no cause for removing him."

This is to our friend a thunderclap from a clear sky. Is he to confess himself powerless to get Jones the post-office he has promised? It would ruin his prestige in his district, and Jones would become his enemy. What is to be done? Appeals to the Postmaster-General, and even to the President, avail nothing. But was not something said about there being no charges against the present Blankville postmaster? Might not that defect be remedied? Why not get up some charges against that postmaster, be he ever so good an officer and blameless a man? This is the way out. Now to work!

When our member of Congress is again alone with himself the recollection that he once was a gentleman painfully struggles up in his mind. What! Is he to instigate or even to countenance the trumping up of charges affecting the official, and perhaps even the personal character of an honorable man to effect the removal of that man from an office efficiently filled, and this merely to enable him—the member of Congress—to redeem a promise which he never ought to have made? He would not look into a mirror at that moment for fear of seeing his own face. He does not dare to listen to a warning voice speaking within him. With cowardly haste he seeks refuge in the thought that politics is politics; that this is the custom of the country, and that so long as that custom permits and even obliges members of Congress to use the offices of the Government as rewards for their henchmen—why, such things will be done, whatever their character and effect.

And thus the shameful game of trumped-up charges is played, and our friend has more Joneses to provide with more post-offices, which causes more conferences at the Department, in some cases the trumping up of more charges, the disappointment of more men who had promises, the making of more pledges to "furnish something equally as good," and more sacrifices of honor and self-respect.

But now comes the task of getting for his friends places which are not, like the post-offices, regarded as "belonging" to the member of Congress, but for which he must compete with other members, and even with the more formidable Senators—places in the Departments, or consulships, or foreign missions, or revenue offices, or Indian agencies, and what not.

He visits the Departments, one after another, and humbly seeks in each the favor of that awful potentate, the appointment clerk, who can keep him informed of existing vacancies, and who also may see to it that his papers are opportunely brought to the attention of the Secretary whenever a good chance for catching an office occurs. And, oh! those hours of desolate standing around, and of anxious waiting for a propitious moment when he can pour his supplications into the ear of the President or of Cabinet ministers, painfully aware that the more impressively he speaks the more he is in danger of being set down by them as an intolerable bore.

That, however, is not the worst of it. Presently he discovers that he can not possibly secure all the places he asks for, that he can not gratify all the hopes he has excited—perhaps only very few of them—and that he must concentrate his efforts upon those few and drop the rest, lest he lose all. As to the few to be favored, he is sorely tempted to select those whom he may expect to be the most useful to him, with scant regard for their fitness as to the places desired. But how drop the rest?

Can he tell them that he is unable to press their claims to a successful issue while they see him press the claims of others? This would be the way to make enemies. It can not be thought of. But what else can he do? Make them believe that he is pressing their claims, but that after heroic efforts he is defeated by superior influence; throw the responsibility upon the President or the Cabinet ministers. And then comes the distressing spectacle of a member of Congress with a confiding constituent by his side appearing before a Department chief and making a glowing speech on the virtues of that constituent, and on his own ardent desire to see this excellent man placed in office according to his merits, assuring the Department chief, and charging him so to inform the President, that this is the Congressman's special request—while the Department chief thus addressed has been before advised by the same member of Congress that he cares nothing about this man but really wishes another to be provided for; and then the member of Congress accepts the warm thanks of the confiding constituent for this splendid effort of friendship.

In this manner weeks and weeks pass after the incoming of the new Administration, and still our friend has on his hands a formidable number of pursuers to whom he has promised "something equally as good," and others, too, to whom he has promised nothing, but whom he thinks he can not afford to offend by blunt refusals.

Some have left Washington, but flood him with letters. Others have stayed and indomitably dog his steps. Some owe boarding bills in Washington, and have no money left for the home journey. In his despair he pays their bills and buys them their railroad tickets to deliver himself of the insufferable infliction, promising to move heaven and earth for them in their absence. But there are a few who still have funds and will not go, and from them the wretched statesman, jaded and disgusted, at last runs away himself and hurries home. But there he finds no rest. Incessantly he is pestered by the reproaches of the disappointed and by the impatience of those who are still expectants.

He begins to doubt whether the patronage business has not made him more enemies than friends. Fortunate he is if he does not find himself forced to run away once more, without leaving his address behind, into some solitude far from the madding crowd. And yet he may have to fear that quiet solitude more than the distracting bustle he has escaped, for it will bring to him moments of self-contemplation when memories will rise up before him of promises made to be broken, of confidence invited to be betrayed, and of honor and self-respect lost, never to be retrieved. And yet, of the political debts which the spoils system seduced him to contract, only the most pressing have been paid.

So far he has gone only through the experience of the first months after the incoming of the new Administration, while Congress was not in session. The time arrives for Congress to meet, and he now thinks he will atone for it all by giving his whole soul to that duty for the performance of which he really was elected. But, alas, the old torment will not let him go. The men with claims who have not been provided for are still dogging his heels or mercilessly pelting him with letters, and, like an errand boy, they keep him running from Department to Department. Every new chance opening revives the pressure. The work is never near done, and although it abates somewhat, it continues to trench most severely on the time, working power, and good humor which should wholly belong to the legislator's real duty.

Well, our friend tries hard to do the best he can under the circumstances and flatters himself with the belief that he has at least his political home machine tolerably well arranged, but new complications arise. One of the office-holders appointed upon his recommendation so grossly misconducts himself as to make his removal imperative. There is no doubt as to the facts. But the delinquent public servant calls upon his Congressional patron for protection. Has he not a right to do so? Has he not been appointed simply by way of reward for services rendered to the member of Congress? Has he ever been expected by his patron to earn his salary by downright hard work for the public?

Was he not rather to have "a good time" while in office, and to make out of it what he could? And now, because he did so, he is to lose the reward he had earned, and to be disgraced by removal to boot. Will the Congressional patron leave his client in the lurch? Our friend is a little puzzled at first. In spite of the many rebuffs it has suffered, the old conscience speaks once more. Does his sense of duty permit him to endeavor to keep in office, to the evident detriment of the service and of the public interest, a man he knows to have proved himself unworthy? But there is also another voice speaking to him.

Has not this unworthy public servant friends or relatives who exercise influence in his district? True, he ought never to have recommended this man for office, but can he now afford to make enemies of him and his clan? True, the integrity of the service and the public interest are entitled to consideration; but can he afford that consideration when one of his appointees is concerned and he himself has so much at stake? Well, he seeks to have the removal recalled. He does not find a willing ear. He begs, he protests, he blusters, he threatens, he entreats, he implores the Administration to do a thing which he knows it can not do without being false to its public duty.

But still other complications come to plague him.

The Administration follows some policy which he feels himself in conscience bound to oppose, or vicious practices are discovered in some Government Department which his sense of duty commands him to denounce. His first impulse is to obey that command. But has he not appeared before the President and before the Department chiefs as a petitioner for favors in the shape of offices for his friends? Will he not have to solicit similar favors again, and if he criticises and opposes the Administration, will it not have the power not only to refuse further favors needed by him, but even to remove the persons appointed upon his recommendation? Nay, may not those very persons, his political retainers, the members of his home machine, if he opposes the Administration, turn against him and denounce him as a mugwump and a renegade, for the purpose of winning the favor of the Administration and of thus saving their own necks?

He keenly feels that here his moral independence as a legislator is at stake—that moral independence which, if he is to do his duty to his country, can never be surrendered. But can he afford to maintain it at the risk of losing all the dearly bought results of the management of the patronage in his district, and even of turning his own handiwork against himself? No; unless there be in him some of the stuff of which martyrs are made the moral independence of the legislator will die as a sacrifice at the shrine of that patronage. And to many legislators making that sacrifice it will hardly occur that it bears all the features of a bargain essentially corrupt.

NEW ALBANY, IND., December 11, 1897.

DEAR SIR: I have read with hearty gratification the telegraphic synopsis of your speech in defense of the civil-service law. The President is right in his position as to this system, as you are in your effort to sustain it, and in addition the law is itself popular with the great body of the people. I am satisfied that much of the opposition to it on the floor of the House is insincere, and the clamor raised throughout the country against it comes from either interested or uninformed persons. The number of such persons who are making the outcry is relatively very small, but you know that the pig which has its head fast in the fence makes more noise than all the rest of the herd that are standing by. Herewith I send you copy of a little speech I made in 1895. If it has any value, it arises from the following facts:

1. That it was made at a meeting of the Jackson Club, presumably all spoilsmen.

2. That the man who made it, as you well know, was once a thorough and vociferous advocate of the spoils system, and for a long time at the head of the party machinery in Indiana.

3. Because it attacks the system in a manner different from the usual one in that it attempts to show that the deserving partisans do not obtain the spoils of office, but that the distribution is governed by other and infinitely baser considerations.

I have marked the portions of the speech which relate to this feature of the controversy, and if it will be of the slightest use to you, you are at liberty to use it in any way you see fit.

With sincere personal regards, I am, your friend,

CHARLES L. JEWETT.

Hon. HENRY U. JOHNSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

[Part of resolution No. 8, relating to civil-service pensions, of the resolutions adopted by the National Civil Service Reform League of the United States at its annual meeting held at Cincinnati, Ohio, December 17, 1897.]

The League * * * expressly disclaims any advocacy of civil-service pensions as a part of the merit system, which contemplates such pensions no more than did the system of appointment and removal by favor, prevailing before the merit system was introduced; on the contrary, the protection which an assured tenure during efficiency affords to public servants should enable them by the exercise of the frugality and forethought displayed by all prudent persons to provide out of their current earnings for the ordinary contingencies and infirmity.

ONLY REPRESENT THEMSELVES.

The attitude of the Republican party on the question of civil service should not be misunderstood, no matter how certain gentlemen may attempt to change or misconstrue it, both in and out of Congress. The utterance of the last Republican national convention leaves no doubt on the matter. It was distinctly in favor of the reform. President McKinley was elected on that platform. In his letter of acceptance he said:

"The pledge of the Republican national convention that our civil-service laws 'shall be sustained and thoroughly and honestly enforced and extended wherever practicable' is in keeping with the position of the party for the last twenty years, and will be faithfully observed. Our opponents decry these reforms. They appear willing to abandon all the advantages gained after so many years of agitation and effort. The Republican party earnestly opposes this reactionary and entirely unjustifiable policy. It will take no step backward on this question."

In his inaugural address President McKinley reaffirmed his friendship for the law, and declared:

"As a member of Congress I voted and spoke in favor of the present law, and I shall attempt its enforcement in the spirit in which it was enacted."

The present civil-service law is a Republican enactment. President Arthur signed the bill, and President Harrison did all in his power to extend its workings and influence. The opposition of Democrats to the law is to be expected, as the Chicago platform declared war upon the system, and Mr. Bryan went about the country decrying it. But this is rather poor company for Republicans, especially those who were closely connected with President McKinley's campaign and his election. However, they are alone responsible for their position. They do not represent the Republican party or enlightened public opinion on the subject.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

The Commercial Tribune joins with all those people of Cincinnati who believe in good government, efficiently administered, in extending to the National Civil-Service Reform League a hearty welcome. The Civil-Service League assembles in this city to-day for its annual meeting, and we trust that its deliberations of the next few days and the utterances here made by its members will add still further strength to a good cause which is deserving of hearty and cordial public support.

On the day after the recent assembling of Congress, and in discussing President McKinley's message in these columns, we expressed our opinion regarding the principle of civil service in these words:

"When we find the President saying, in reference to civil service, that 'the system has the approval of the people, and it will be my endeavor to uphold and extend it,' we applaud the sentiment and congratulate the people upon its utterance. The efficient performance of public work is demanded by the people, and a system which insures such efficiency must be steadfastly maintained."

This opinion we now repeat, as a token of our good will toward the guests who come among us to-day, and we have no hesitation in saying that it is a sentiment in harmony with the belief of an overwhelming majority of the citizens of Cincinnati, of Ohio, and of the Union.

On Friday last the subject of the civil service came up in debate in the National House of Representatives, and we regret to say that a distinguished and able Congressman from Ohio denounced the civil service as an "abomination," and declared that it is not a cardinal principle of the Republican party. The gentleman was mistaken. If he will read the platform of the National Republican party, as reported by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, and adopted in St. Louis on June 18, 1896, he will find the following embodied in that declaration of principles:

"The civil-service law was placed on the statute book by the Republican party, which has always sustained it, and we renew our repeated declarations that it shall be thoroughly and heartily and honestly enforced and extended wherever practicable."

That political creed suits the Commercial Tribune, and we stand squarely upon it.

After a trial extending over a considerable number of years the value of the civil service has been proved, and is no longer open to question. We do not say, nor does any other friend of civil service, that it is yet perfect, or that it has not been abused, for it can be still further improved, and its spirit has been violated more than once. But we do say that while perhaps 1,000,000 office seekers and would-be officeholders desire its abolition, there are 69,000,000 citizens who demand its maintenance, in order that the public business may be conducted in an efficient and conscientious manner by intelligent and trained public servants.

Take the case of Cincinnati, for instance. In this city there may be 1,000 men who hope to see the civil service wiped out in order that they may obtain public employment without being compelled to demonstrate their fitness for holding public place. But, on the other hand, there are 300,000 supporters of civil service in this city, including practically all the business men and those who contribute most largely toward the maintenance of the Republic, whose only concern in the question is to enjoy the security and benefits of good government. Which side should dominate the other?

The opponents of civil service in Congress are now presenting arguments against the system, in the effort to abolish the existing principle that the public business shall be transacted and performed by governmental employees whose proven competency is an essential preliminary to their selection. Mr. GROSVENOR, of Ohio, discusses the question, from the standpoint of an enemy of civil service, in the columns of to-day's Commercial Tribune, and his words are very interesting. But we are firmly of the conviction that he and those who agree with him are mistaken.

Congress will not abolish the civil service. There need be no apprehension upon that score. If our lawmakers at Washington act upon the question in any manner, they should still further improve and strengthen the service, in order that its possible imperfections may be eliminated and its benefits to the people may be substantially increased.

VALUE OF THE CIVIL SERVICE.

President McKinley, who is quite a careful student of the times, in speaking of civil-service reform in his letter of acceptance, says: "They (the Bryanites) encourage a return to methods of party favoritism which both parties have often denounced, that experience has condemned, and of which the people have repeatedly disapproved."

Our correspondent who signs himself "One of the People" makes the surprising assertion that the American people are questioning whether the merit system of appointment to subordinate offices "is not a serious menace to our American form of government."

The last official announcement of the Republican party, in convention assembled, and the opinion of the present head of the Government contradict the view of our correspondent, who seems to be deluded by the idea that the methods of Tammany are more in accordance with the theory of the Government which was established by our forefathers than are those methods of appointment which were practiced by Washington and every President down to the time of Jackson.

Marcy, Van Buren, and Burr, who had received their political education in Tammany Hall, played upon that great weakness in the character of Andrew Jackson, which made him consider all who differed from him in opinion as his enemies, and thus, for the first time, infected the Federal service with the poison of the spoils system. After two generations had endured this evil, against which Lincoln cried out in despair when he said that the army of office seekers against whom he had to fight was more to be dreaded than the army of the Confederacy, President Grant made the first demand for a reform. He was followed by President Hayes in the same strain, and in 1883, under President Arthur, the present civil-service law was passed, and from that day to this no President has taken a backward step.

Under the merit system there is no favored class. Favoritism exists only under the spoils system. Under the merit system no appointments to office depend upon favor, but upon the fitness of every applicant. Furthermore, there is a merit tenure, but no life tenure, under the civil-service law. Any employee, even under President McKinley's recent rule aimed against arbitrary removals, may be dismissed at any time for reasons satisfactory to his superior officer. It would be just as truthful to say that the employees of any commercial house are "life appointees" because they are appointed to serve so long as their services are needed or so long as they are faithful servants and are not liable to be dismissed because of their political opinions. This is one of the fallacies suggested by those who wish to be able again to use the offices for the purchase of votes.

The beneficent working of the law of 1883 has been testified to by every President and Cabinet officer who has observed its results. Postmaster-General Gary, in his report of 1897, shows that since its application to the Railway Mail Service the number of correct deliveries of mail pieces to one error has increased from about 3,500 to 12,000 in 1897.

Our correspondent says, "Civil-service reform is an insult to the capacity of the American people for self-government." On the contrary, it well might be said of the American people, if they permit the reestablishment of the spoils system in their national civil service that they have cast doubts upon their capacity for self-government. There is no other civilized nation on the face of the globe which does not select its subordinate servants with reference to their fitness, and after a test by which that fitness is ascertained.

LIBERAL REPUBLICAN AND DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM OF 1872.

5. The civil service of the Government has become a mere instrument of partisan tyranny and personal ambition and object of selfish greed. It is a scandal and reproach upon free institutions, and breeds a demoralization dangerous to the perpetuity of republican Government. We therefore regard a thorough reform of the civil service as one of the most pressing necessities of the hour; that honesty, capacity, and fidelity constitute the only valid claim to public employment; that the offices of the Government cease to be a matter of arbitrary favoritism and patronage, and that public station become again a post of honor. To this end it is imperatively required that no President shall be a candidate for reelection.

REPUBLICAN PLATFORM OF 1872.

5. Any system of the civil service under which the subordinate positions of the Government are considered rewards for mere party zeal is fatally demoralizing, and we therefore favor a reform of the system by laws which shall abolish the evils of patronage and make honesty, efficiency, and fidelity the essential qualifications for public positions, without practically creating a life tenure of office.

LABOR REFORM CONVENTION OF 1872.

11. That there should be such a reform in the civil service of the National Government as will remove it beyond all partisan influence and place it in the charge and under the direction of intelligent and competent business men.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM OF 1876.

Reform is necessary in the civil service. Experience proves that efficient, economical conduct of the governmental business is not possible if its civil service be subject to change at every election, be a prize fought for at the ballot box, be a brief reward of party zeal, instead of posts of honor assigned for proved competency and held for fidelity in the public employ; that the dispensing of patronage should neither be a tax upon the time of all our public men nor the instrument of their ambition. Here again promises falsified in the performance attest that the party in power can work out no practical or salutary reform.

REPUBLICAN PLATFORM OF 1876.

8. Under the Constitution the President and heads of Departments are to make nominations for office; the Senate is to advise and consent to appointments, and the House of Representatives is to accuse and prosecute faithless officers. The best interests of the public service demands that these distinctions be respected; that Senators and Representatives who may be judges and accusers should not dictate appointments to office. The invariable rule in appointments should have reference to the honesty, fidelity, and capacity of the appointees, giving to the party in power those places where harmony and vigor of administration require its policy to be represented, but permitting all others to be filled by persons selected with sole reference to the efficiency of the public service, and the right of all citizens to share in the honor of rendering faithful service to the country.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM OF 1880.

We execrate the course of this Administration in making places in the civil service a reward for political crime, and demand a reform by statute which shall make it forever impossible for the defeated candidate to bribe his way to the seat of the usurper by billeting villains upon the people.

REPUBLICAN PLATFORM OF 1880.

9. The Republican party, adhering to the principles affirmed by its last national convention of respect for the constitutional rules governing appointments to office, adopts the declaration of President Hayes, that the reform of the civil service should be thorough, radical, and complete. To this end it demands the cooperation of the legislative with the executive departments of the Government, and that Congress shall so legislate that fitness, ascertained by proper practical tests, shall admit to the public service.

PROHIBITION PLATFORM OF 1884.

That we favor reforms in the administration of the Government in the abolition of all sinecures, useless offices and officers, in the election of the post-office officers of the Government instead of appointment by the President; that competency, honesty, and sobriety are essential qualifications for holding civil office, and we oppose the removal of such persons from mere administrative offices except so far as it may be absolutely necessary to secure effectiveness to the vital issues on which the general administration of the Government has been intrusted to a party.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM OF 1884.

We favor honest civil-service reform and a compensation of all United States officers by fixed salaries, the separation of church and state, and the diffusion of free education by common schools, so that every child in the land may be taught the rights and duties of citizenship.

REPUBLICAN PLATFORM OF 1884.

Reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under Republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system, already established by law, to all the grades of the service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all Executive appointments; and all laws at variance with the objects of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectively avoided.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM OF 1888.

Honest reform in the civil service has been inaugurated and maintained by President Cleveland, and he has brought the public service to the highest standard of efficiency, not only by rule and precept, but by the example of his own untiring and unselfish administration of public affairs.

REPUBLICAN PLATFORM OF 1888.

The men who abandoned the Republican party in 1884 and continue to adhere to the Democratic party have deserted not only the cause of honest government, of sound finance, of freedom, of purity of the ballot, but especially have deserted the cause of reform in the civil service. We will not fail to keep our pledges because they have broken theirs, or because their candidate has broken his. We therefore repeat our declaration of 1884, to wit: "The reform of the civil service auspiciously begun under the Republican Administration should be completed by the further extension of the reform system already established by law to all the grades of the service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all Executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the object of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectually avoided."

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM OF 1892.

SEC. 9. Public office is a public trust. We reaffirm the declaration of the Democratic national convention of 1876 for the reform of the civil service, and we call for the honest enforcement of all laws regulating the same. The nomination of a President, as in the recent Republican convention, by delegations composed largely of his appointees, holding office at his pleasure, is a scandalous satire upon free popular institutions and a startling illustration of the methods by which a President may gratify his ambition. We denounce a policy under which Federal officeholders usurp control of party conventions in the States, and we pledge the Democratic party to the reform of these and all other abuses which threaten individual liberty and local self-government.

REPUBLICAN PLATFORM OF 1892.

We commend the spirit and evidence of reform in the civil service and the wise and consistent enforcement by the Republican party of the laws regulating the same.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM OF 1896.

We are opposed to life tenure in the public service. We favor appointments based upon merit, fixed terms of office, and such an administration of the civil-service laws as will afford equal opportunities to all citizens of ascertained fitness.

REPUBLICAN PLATFORM OF 1896.

The civil-service law was placed on the statute book by the Republican party, which has always sustained it, and we renew our repeated declarations that it shall be thoroughly and honestly enforced and extended wherever practicable.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to incorporate certain extracts in his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield ten minutes to my colleague, Mr. LLOYD.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, it is especially interesting on this side of the Chamber to consider what is taking place on the other side. Perhaps never in the history of this body has there been such a debate on one side of this Chamber as has taken place on that side to-day.

But I am constrained to inquire what it is that troubles our Republican friends. It would seem from reading their utterances, from listening to their statements, that gentlemen on that side of the Chamber were in fact opposed to civil-service reform; but if you have listened to the statements of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], you will remember that he concluded with the statement that he was in favor of reforming the civil service.

Why, it has been understood on this side, and I believe on that, that the distinguished Representative from that State was actually opposed to the civil service. I am constrained to believe that the speech of the distinguished "young gentleman" from Indiana, as he has been termed [Mr. LANDIS], fully illustrates the trouble on that side. And what is it? Simply that there are in this unfortunate period in the history of this nation a few Democrats in office. I believe full well that that bright young orator, if it were true, and he knew it, that there was not a Democrat serving in any place in the United States service, would to-day be ready to hush his voice, and that he would have nothing to say in opposition to the present civil-service law. What is the trouble?

Those who have been watching public affairs have observed that it is the party in power that winces under this civil-service law. It has occurred at other times in the history of this country. The distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] who has just taken his seat referred to the fact that in 1884, following the inauguration of this law, there was a change of Administration; that in 1888, following the operation and extension of this law, there was a change of Administration; that in 1892, and again in 1896, there was a change of Administration. You are aware of the fact, for you have observed it, that no man since the adoption of that law has been permitted to stay for eight years in the Executive Mansion. Why is it? We refer you to one of the causes of it—the dissatisfaction of the people with the administration of this law.

It is not my purpose in the few minutes allotted to me to discuss the civil-service measure, but I am constrained to call attention to one or two points. Early in the history of this great nation of ours there was a contest, an important one, the principles involved in which are the principles involved largely in this contest. You remember that in the early history of this nation there was a great conflict as to who should rule and what should be the policy of this Government—a contest led on the one hand by Alexander Hamilton and on the other by Thomas Jefferson. Alexander Hamilton said we must have an aristocracy: "You can not trust the people to rule." Mr. Jefferson, on the other hand, insisted on that grand old doctrine that this should be a government of the people, for the people, and by the people.

The latter views were adopted, and if this country shall grow in its importance and grandeur as we believe it will, it must be through the maintenance of the principles laid down by Mr. Jefferson, insisting on a government by the people. But what is undertaken to be done in our own midst? To establish the doctrine of Alexander Hamilton, as I understand it. You are creating an aristocracy in office; you are creating a select class, who are to control the fiscal affairs, the great bureaus of this Government, men who are not responsible to the people at all, who are not, in a certain sense, even responsible to the chiefs of divisions in which they may be employed. They charge on that side of the Chamber, because we do not subscribe to the doctrines of civil service as they carry it out, that we are spoilsmen.

There is a sense in which I am proud to be called a spoilsman. There is not an individual in this House, as I believe, who is not a spoilsman. Every member on that side of the Chamber is in full sympathy with the idea of rewarding his own political friends. The President, when he comes into office, selects his Cabinet. Whom does he select? He selects his political friends. The heads of Departments being chosen, whom do they bring to their aid in order that they may have an efficient service? They bring to them their political friends. You need not expect successful service of any kind in this Government unless those individuals who are charged with the administration of affairs are in political sympathy with the Chief Executive.

The distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] himself is decidedly opposed to the Democratic doctrine of rotation in office; and yet to the utter astonishment of this body, no doubt, before he took his seat, after the grandest forensic effort perhaps in his life, he asserts that even the Chief Executive of this nation ought to be changed every four years; that no one of them ought to be eligible to reelection. That is carrying the doctrine of rotation further than the Democrats themselves carry it, for they are in favor of Democrats holding at least two terms.

It is charged that Washington and Jefferson in the early history of this country were both antispoilsmen. Was George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, John Adams, or any of the early Presidents of this country called upon to subscribe to a civil-service bill?

Where is the Administration of those that are quoted in favor of honesty that subscribed to a civil-service commission such as we have in operation to-day? Not one of them. It is asserted that the spoils system did not come into vogue until Andrew Jackson was elected President. So far as I am concerned, I believe that one of the greatest epochs in the history of this nation was when Andrew Jackson was made President. There have been few Administrations since that of Jackson of which citizens ought to be more proud than that of that iron-willed individual known as "Old Hickory Jackson." What was his doctrine? The gentleman from Indiana asserts that it was, "To the victors belong the spoils."

I ask you, in this day of the Civil Service Commission, with 178,000 employees in the service under it, who is it that is rewarded? How many Democrats have received appointments to office since the 4th day of March, 1897? How many? The gentleman is opposed to the spoils system, and yet his party practically indorses it, because only members of that party are appointed to office. I was astonished at another feature of the speech just concluded, and that was this:

He explained that there were more Republicans in office under civil service than Democrats; that Mr. Cleveland appointed a number of Republicans to office; that Presidents Arthur, Harrison, and McKinley had appointed no Democrats. Yet he is insisting on the merit system, which teaches that the politics of the applicants for place is not to be considered, but admits at the same time that his party has never practically enforced it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I only desire, if the House will permit it, that I should have liberty to incorporate a few remarks that I have not submitted.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the legislative appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MOODY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 7, 1898.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. DAVIS, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in response to the resolution of the 18th ultimo, certain information relative to the appointive positions in his Department which should be excepted from the operation of the laws governing the civil service or the rules established by the Civil Service Commission; which the Secretary proceeded to read.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the communication be printed in the RECORD and referred, without reading, to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The communication will be printed and referred.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope it will be printed as a separate document as well as in the RECORD.

Mr. HOAR. Of course.

Mr. COCKRELL. And at the proper time, when we get in all these recommendations of Cabinet officers, I shall move that they be respectfully referred to the President of the United States for his information and consideration.

Mr. HOAR. The trouble with all these communications comes from the ill-advised action of the Senate itself. If I may say so within the rule of order, it seems to me it was a most extraordinary proceeding for the Senate of the United States to direct the heads of Departments to give their opinion as to the wisdom of one of the President's orders. But that is what we have done, inadvertently undoubtedly.

Mr. COCKRELL. I regret that the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], who introduced the resolution, is not present to vindicate it. He will doubtless do so when he is present.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was the order of an ex-President, I will suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. But still it is an Executive order. They are kept on, of course. If my attention had been called to it in time, before the responses began to come in, I should have moved to rescind the resolution.

The communication was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, and ordered to be printed, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 5, 1898.

SIR: In response to the resolution of the Senate of December 18, 1897, directing the heads of the several Executive Departments to inform the Senate what appointive positions, if any, in their respective Departments should, in their opinion, be excepted from the operation of the laws governing the civil service or the rules established by the Civil Service Commission; and to inform the Senate what changes or amendments to the present civil-service rules seem to be desirable, as indicated by their experience, I have the honor to reply that by an amendment of Rule III of the civil-service rules the "classified service" is made to include all officers in the several Executive Departments. This necessarily includes (regarding the letter of the provision) all attorneys and assistant attorneys, including in the latter class assistant district attorneys.

There is an exception made by Rule VI, as follows:

"(c) Attorneys or assistant attorneys in any Department whose main duties are connected with the management of cases in court."

Passing without comment the ambiguity of this provision, the distinction it makes between the duties of attorneys is artificial and unsound. Attorneys and assistant attorneys, including in the latter assistant district attorneys, should be removed from the "classified service."

In this recommendation I have only considered the civil-service law and rules by themselves and without reference or regard to statutes which may be said to modify or conflict with them, and the same comment may be made as to the recommendation in regard to deputy marshals. Office deputy marshals are said to be included in the "classified service" by that part of Rule III which provides as follows:

"* * * The departmental service shall include officers and employees as follows: * * * (b) All executive officers and employees outside of the District of Columbia * * * who are serving in a clerical capacity, or whose duties are in whole or in part of a clerical nature."

There is, however, a conflict of opinion as to the effect of this provision as against certain provisions of the Revised Statutes. The Comptroller of the Treasury holds that the terms of deputies expire with those of their principals. This view has been sustained by Judge Rogers of the western district of Arkansas, and was opposed by Judge Jackson of the district of West Virginia. It is not necessary to decide between these views. Considering the relations between a marshal and his deputies, the latter should not be in the "classified service," and all doubts should be removed by an explicit amendment to the rules.

The other positions in this Department, as indicated by my present experience, may fairly be said to be properly within the reason and purpose of the civil-service law.

By an amendment to the civil-service rules, made May 6, 1896, there was created in the "classified service" positions termed "excepted positions," and these were defined to be by decision (e), Rule I, "any position within the provisions of the civil-service act, but excepted from the requirements of competitive examination or registration for appointment thereto." In this class are all attorneys and assistant attorneys, even though their "main duties are connected with the management of cases in court." The position is an unsatisfactory one. Every removal will be invidious and complained of as being for political reasons. I therefore recommend that the "excepted positions" be abolished.

Respectfully,

JOSEPH MCKENNA,
Attorney-General.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

FINANCIAL POLICY.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit a resolution for which I ask present consideration. I understand the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] desires to be heard this morning on it, and I should also like to submit some remarks.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the United States should, without delay and without waiting for the consent of foreign nations, begin and thereafter continue the free and unrestricted coinage of standard silver at the present legal ratio of 16 parts of standard silver to 1 part of standard gold; that such coinage should be supplemented by a safe and sound national paper money, to be issued directly by the Government and without the intervention of banks, which should be a full legal tender for all debts, public and private, and should be issued in an amount sufficient to meet the demands of the business population of the country and restore the just level of prices of labor and production; that an increase of the public interest-bearing debt should be prohibited, and no Government bonds should be issued or sold except by specific act of Congress authorizing the same, and then only in cases of pressing necessity; that all laws authorizing individuals to demonetize or discriminate against any form of money by private or special contract should be repealed, and the Government in the discharge of its obligations should use its option as to the kind of lawful money in which they are to be paid, and such option should never be surrendered to the holders of Government securities.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to submit a few words on the resolution, if the Senator from Nebraska is not going to take the floor. If he is, I will wait.

Mr. ALLEN. I will yield for the time being to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from Nebraska intends to take the floor, I would rather have him take it now, and I will follow him. I want to say a few words on the resolution.

Mr. HALE. Let the matter go over for a day.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit to the Senator from Maine that the remarks I have to make are prepared and will require only about ten minutes.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator want to go on now?

Mr. ALLEN. Unless there is something more important to occupy the attention of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I will not make objection, of course, if the Senator wants to go on now.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I ask to have the resolution read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The Secretary again read Mr. ALLEN's resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, these resolutions embrace the substance of Populist belief on the money question. I will content myself at this time by speaking in general terms, but I shall at another and more opportune moment take up the principles announced and discuss and analyze them fully. It seems to be anomalous to some persons that the Populist party should have an existence, and still more surprising that it should increase in numbers. Many believe "there is no room," as they say, "for three parties," and I have frequently been asked the broad and somewhat vague, if not idle, question, "What do you Populists propose to do, and what do you want, anyway?"

The Populist party wants, in the first place, without delay and without waiting for the consent of any other nation, the free and unrestricted coinage of gold and silver at the present legal ratio. This has been discussed so frequently in the public journals, on the hustings, and in Congress that there is not much new to be said on it so far as its academic features are concerned, but it involves the quantitative theory of money, and I believe those who oppose that theory have been driven from the field of discussion and defeated at every point. I think no man lives or ever will live who can demonstrate that the plutocratic theory of money—namely, that its value is in the substance on which it is stamped or printed—is correct, while I think every school child of intelligence and of fair education can show that the sole value of money, as money, is in the office or function of circulation and exchange. But when the money function ceases and the substance enters the commercial world, a different rule applies.

This being true, and it likewise being true that the volume of money in a given country must at all times be equivalent in its exchange value to the sum of all other things held for trade in that country, it is important that the volume should be such as will give every laborer fair compensation for his work and every man who has anything to market a fair price for his commodity. This can not be done under the single gold standard, for the simple reason, if for no other, that there is not enough gold in the world to perform the work required of money, and I use the expression "money" in its comprehensive sense as embracing both money and currency as those words are commonly used. These are some of the things the Populist party wants.

The second proposition is that the volume of gold and silver coin should be supplemented by full legal-tender paper money issued directly by the Government, and that private associations should under no circumstances be permitted to issue notes for circulation, for if one should be given the power, all should have it, and currency would be issued without restriction and become as worthless as shavings.

Sound policy requires that the power of issuing money, being sovereign in its nature, should remain in Congress, where it is placed by the Constitution. Any abandonment of the power by Congress would be in violation of the Constitution and be bound to lead to bad results, and would, by giving the right of sudden expansion and contraction, be used in the interest of the association to whom it should be given, to the injury of the people. The issuance of bank notes costs every human being in the United States annually 3 cents per head, and this tax is unnatural, unjust, and inexcusable, and in a government where conscience and justice are the ruling motives of legislators could not exist. Legal-tender notes are issuable by the Government under the Constitution, as has been declared in half a dozen or more cases by the Supreme Court, and in a score of well-considered cases by the courts of last resort of many of the States.

Of course such a volume of money should not be without limitation, for if it were not limited it would be as worthless as a volume of valueless national-bank notes. In fact, all money, whether coin or paper, must be limited to preserve the equity of contracts and measure truly the value of property and services. In the case of coin, nature fixes the limit, and we call it the automatic theory of limitation. In the other case Congress, the lawmaking authority of the Government, would be required to rigidly limit the issuance of money. There is much difference of opinion as to whether paper notes should be redeemable in coin by the Government or not. I hold that a reasonable volume of full legal-tender paper money, anticipating the revenues of the Government, redeemable therein, and receivable for all public debts and dues, is a sufficient redemption, and that such money can be sustained at par with any other.

To permit national banks to issue money is not only a flagrant and inexcusable abandonment of the sovereign power to issue money, but it places a dangerous instrument in the hands of the few for their own pecuniary benefit at the expense of the millions. I can not believe that national banks are altogether patriotic institutions. I do not believe that in increasing the volume of money, or in decreasing it, as they are doing now, they would be actuated by anything like patriotism and a due regard for the public welfare. I think, like all others engaged in private enterprises to advance their own pecuniary condition, they would be guided solely by the consideration whether they would make money by contraction or expansion, and thus the power would be placed in their hands to contract the volume of money and thereby throw millions out of employment, shrink the value of property to a point where they might buy it for one-half, or less, its actual value, and then, by a system of sudden and wild expansion and contraction, buy and sell to their own private advantage, and thus the endless process of bankruptcy and inflated periods go on as the result of their exercise of this power, to the infinite injury of the people.

Mr. President, the power is dangerous from another standpoint. We can not shut our eyes to the fact that the money power dominates every branch of the Government, while the people are deceived into believing that this is a popular government, in which they have a full share. It is a government by the few and for the few. If this power of issuing money were turned over to the national banks, it would be but a comparatively short time until the masses would be practically deprived of their right to vote or to participate in the Government in any form, and we would pass from the semblance of a Republic into a complete aristocracy, without any pretense of a government by the people. These consequences are fearful to contemplate, and the power is too great and decidedly too delicate to be intrusted to the few. We should not imperil the interests of present and future generations by farming out this right to associations. I hold that man to be an enemy of his country, whether conciously or not I do not pretend to say, who would turn over the power to make and issue money to private institutions. It would be just as well, as patriotic, and as wise to farm out the right to command the Army, or the Navy, or to render judicial decisions, or to perform any other duty that is public and sovereign in its character, expecting them to deal justly in the interests of all, as to expect national banks to take into consideration the public welfare in the issuance of money. I am, have ever been, and shall always remain decidedly opposed to the issue power of national banks.

The volume of money should, of course, as I have said, be sufficient to meet the business demands of the country and to restore and maintain the just level of prices of labor and production. Inasmuch as population and wealth increase annually a little less than 3 per cent, the volume should keep pace with that increase, thus giving a contract made to-day the same value in human production five years from now that it possessed at the moment it was made, and no more. A law that will approximate that end will deal out justice as closely as we can hope to approach it.

I regard it as a signal of danger that we have entered on the policy of issuing interest-bearing obligations on every conceivable occasion and pretext. The fathers of our country warned us against a perpetual national debt, for debt is human bondage, and those who are obliged to pay it are slaves. They may assemble and resolve that they are free, but they are bondslaves until the debt is paid, and the Government, like a prudent individual, should get out of debt as speedily as possible and remain out. It would be useless to point out that the Government interest-bearing debt of less than $3,000,000,000 at the close of the war has cost the people, in their labor and productions, over $7,000,000,000 thus far, and yet we have a thousand million dollars left, and the Administration and Mr. Gage, the Secretary of the Treasury, would have us increase this interest-bearing debt to a thousand million more, the interest charge to the people under such circumstances being $60,000,000 annually.

There is no law in the statute books authorizing the issuance of Government bonds, and every such obligation issued under the Administration of Grover Cleveland is ipso facto null and void for want of authority, and would be so declared by any court having the moral courage to administer the law as it exists. The Bland-Allison Act of 1878 and the Sherman Act of 1890 contained the seeds of their own destruction, for each provided for the issuance of certain notes and at the same time authorized parties by special contract to repudiate them and discriminate against various forms of money. This transfer of the sovereign right of legal tender, which for three centuries or more has been the right of the debtor, is inexcusable, and I defy any lawyer here or elsewhere to cite any authority, ancient or modern, apart from those two statutes, that gives or ever gave the creditor the right to specify the particular kind of legal-tender money in which he should be paid. This power has been shamefully abused and turned over to those who, to advance their own interests, would see the Government sunk to the bottom of the ocean.

The men who are dealing in money in this nation are not all patriots. I do not decry a man because he deals in money if he is honest and patriotic. He may do so and be an excellent citizen, and if he is, I would say naught to his discredit, but the rule is that such men know no nation, no patriotism, and but few have knowledge of any God save the gold they horde and worship.

It is the aim and purpose of the Populist party to change all these conditions and bring about a different condition of public affairs; it is the aim and purpose of that party to call back the spirit of departed patriotism as it existed a century ago; it is its aim and purpose to have a government of the people, for the people, and by the people, in which all invidious class distinctions shall be put aside, and where men and women shall be known and respected for their character and intelligence and not for the paltry dollars they carry in their pockets.

The Populist party was created for these purposes, and others that I will not now consume time in mentioning. It will live until they are accomplished; it will live, flourish, and be honored by the American people when other parties are buried and forgotten, for it is the party of the masses. It is the antithesis of the Republican party, for that organization believes in high taxation; that a man can be made rich by taxing himself; that taxation will give him labor and high wages; or, in other words, and using a homely expression, that he can lift himself by his boot straps. It is the party of plutocracy; it believes in the classes and not the masses, and in invidious distinctions, and it can not survive in its present form, or the Republic will go down in hopeless night.

The Democratic party, seeing the error of its ways under the leadership of Grover Cleveland, has changed its course and has now become the fast friend of the free and unlimited coinage of silver. Mr. President, we welcome this long step in the right direction, but the Democratic party is very far from being the Populist party. It has advanced to our position on the national-bank question, and yet it falls short of reaching the high plane of Populism. We believe that natural monopolies, like railroads, telegraphs, and telephones, must be owned and operated by the Government in the interest of the people. We believe that United States Senators should be elected by a direct vote, rather than through the instrumentality of the legislature, and that the initiative and referendum should be employed when practicable. In these and other respects the Populist differs widely and wisely from the Democratic party.

Mr. President, I have spoken briefly and generally of the aims and purposes of the Populist party, because I do not at this time desire to unnecessarily consume time. At another time I shall speak more extendedly and undertake to point out the fallacies of the Republican party, but I will content myself now with what I have said, and by asking leave to print in the ordinary type, as a part of my remarks, a speech delivered by me at Boston before the Massachusetts Populist annual banquet, on the 29th of May, 1896, in which I set forth the aims and purposes of the party much more fully than I can do now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska.

The address referred to is as follows:

Hon. W. V. ALLEN, of Nebraska, said:

"FELLOW-CITIZENS: I think I ought to be permitted to congratulate myself on the fact that in making my first appearance in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and in the historic and attractive city of Boston I do so as a Populist attending an important meeting of the representative men of the party.

"I was born in the West and forty years of my life have been spent on that side of the Mississippi where the shadows of the setting sun are last to usher in the night and the songs of birds and the music of waters are first to greet the dawn, and it would be useless for me to attempt to disguise from you that I am deeply attached to that part of our common country.

"I have not enjoyed the privilege of making an extended tour of the East, and of mingling, to any considerable extent, with its people, although I am acquainted with the principal events of its glorious history, and as an American to the manner born, I rejoice with you that in every great struggle to better the condition of the race the 'Old Bay State' has been in the very front rank and true to her early teachings.

"I must return my thanks for the honor conferred on me by your invitation to be present and address you on this occasion. I have, until now, declined to accept all invitations to deliver addresses beyond the confines of my own State; but yours was couched in language that left no doubt that you desired to see and hear one who has, for a few years, endeavored to uphold in the United States Senate the cause of his country against the encroachment of unlawful power and the deadly effect of centralization.

"I will freely admit that in accepting the invitation I was actuated somewhat by a desire to visit this historic ground and learn more of the people by actual contact than I now know. In the early days of the nation there were those who doubted, as there are some who now doubt, the ability of the people to govern themselves, and who sought the establishment of what they were pleased to call a strong government by placing all real power in the hands of the few and mere nominal power in the hands of the masses; but owing, in a large measure, to the wise counsels of Massachusetts statesmen, and to other illustrious and patriotic citizens, better judgment prevailed, and the Government was finally, and let us hope permanently, established on the solid foundation of popular sovereignty. Nearly a century and a quarter have passed since the formation of the Union, only to prove the wisdom of their action.

"I think it will be conceded everywhere that our country needs most at the present time a radical purification of the public service. Certainly permanent prosperity will not return to bless us until every department has been purified and until there is an upward tendency in public morals.

"I know of no reason why a person called to the administration of a public office should not discharge its duties with as great if not greater fidelity than those of private life, for in the one case the welfare of many is affected, while in the other the interests of a few only are concerned.

"A rigid public morality that will set a higher example to the present and to future generations is greatly needed; but, after all, it is perhaps true, as politicians seem to think, that official intelligence and morality will not be of a higher character than the general intelligence and morality of the people who select their public servants, and doubtless many men are guided in their conduct by a knowledge of this fact. The Government is exactly what the people make it. They have it in their power to perfect it if they will; but they are, to a great extent, disorganized, isolated and divided, and working at cross purposes among themselves, while the monopolies and the ruling classes act in unison, employing the best talent and the greatest ability in the accomplishment of their selfish ends, and filling public offices with men chosen by themselves, who do their bidding even to the injury of their fellow-man.

"It is said that during the reigns of Charles I and II, when great political contests existed respecting the royal prerogatives and the rights of the people, those who supported the King in his claims were called Tories, and the advocates of popular rights and parliamentary power over the Crown and the toleration of dissenters were called Whigs. Liberal and Radical have superseded Whig in English politics.

"During the Revolutionary war those who were friendly and supported the cause of freedom were called Whigs. The word was used in contradistinction to Tory and Royalist, and was given in derision to a political party that existed from 1829 to 1856. In my limited search I have been unable to find that the word 'Populist' has found a place in the dictionary, but I think it may properly be said to be derived from the Latin 'populus,' signifying, as the parent word signifies, the common people, the multitude, and comprehending within its definition all persons not distinguished by rank, office, education, or profession. The name was given the People's Party in derision.

"The cardinal principles of the party are these: The free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at the present legal ratio of 16 to 1; the issuance of all money by the General Government as a full legal tender for public and private debts, without the use of banking corporations; an increase of the circulating medium to $50 per capita; a graduated income tax; postal savings banks; a limitation of the national revenues to the necessary expenses of the Government economically and honestly administered; Government ownership of railroads, telegraphs, and telephones; a reduction of lands now held by railroads and other corporations in excess of their actual needs, to Government ownership, and all lands owned by nonresident aliens to be reclaimed by the Government and held for actual settlers.

"I think the judgment of the enlightened world is thoroughly convinced that there is not gold enough with which to perform adequately the work demanded of money. Thoughtful men recognize the necessity of an increase in the volume, not only in this country, but throughout the civilized world. The total gold output is limited, while the strain on basic money is daily growing, owing to the rapid increase of population and wealth. It may be truthfully said that the gold output for monetary uses is practically exhausted, for after deducting that necessary to the arts and in making full weight of abraded coins, there is not enough to add materially to the stock of money.

"How is metallic money to be increased except by the free and unlimited coinage of silver? The world's volume of silver money, as far as we can ascertain, does not exceed that of gold, each amounting, in round numbers, to about $4,000,000,000; and until 1873 they had stood for twenty-seven centuries within three points of each other.

"But why, it is frequently asked, should we coin silver and gold at the ratio of 16 to 1? I answer: Because nature has not and can not establish a ratio, and it must be done by man. Ratio is not a natural law; and 16 to 1 being the relation that was established by our Government in 1837, no reason exists of which I have knowledge why it should at this time be changed. The relation of the coins must therefore, of necessity, be arbitrary, as no two things can, commercially speaking, be said at all times to be of equal value.

"I am in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver because, by the Constitution, it is dedicated as money material, and because to deprive it of free coinage would be an open, flagrant, and inexcusable violation of the fundamental law to the great and permanent injury of the people. I am in favor of free and unlimited coinage because the commercial and industrial interests of the people demand it, and because the prosperity and progress of the country, the true aims of all just and humane governments, will not be compassed until our basic money has been increased. I am in favor of it because it would set all productive agencies at work and enlarge the scope of useful labor, increase wages, and produce contentment and happiness among the people. It would increase individual and national wealth and secure to the producer of the former a rightful portion of that which his hand and craft bring into existence. It would bring to the stricken homes of our country needed prosperity, and chase from their portals the gloom of despair and fill them once more with the sunshine of happiness and joy.

"It is not my purpose to discuss, fully or academically, the many objections made by the gold monometallists to the doctrine of free coinage, although it will be proper for me to notice some of them in a general way. It is said that open mints would flood us with silver from every part of the world, and under the operation of the Gresham law gold would be driven out and we would go to a silver basis. This is an unsound and selfish argument and contrary to the precedents of history. If silver were coined at the mints of the United States at the ratio of 16 to 1 on terms of equality with gold, its bullion value would immediately rise and meet the bullion value of the latter, for it must be known to correct reasoners that the value of gold bullion is equivalent to the coin because of free gold coinage.

"If heavy restrictions were placed on the coinage of gold, and a part of it, like silver, were forced to seek employment in the channels of ordinary commerce and could not, under any circumstances, be admitted to the mints, it would be readily seen that the surplus, fixing the value of the total output, would immediately produce a disparity between the value of the bullion and the coin. But the moment the restriction was removed, the bullion and coin would meet and become equal. This rule holds true as respects silver. Silver bullion as estimated in gold is depreciated in the markets because of restricted coinage, by which a large part of the output is thrown on the market as a mere commodity, and by that means the bullion value of the dollar is less than the face of the coin. But remove the restriction and admit it to the mints on terms of exact equality with gold, and immediately gold and silver bullion and the coins would become equal in value in the markets of our own country and those of the world, and the volume of basic money would be increased 100 per cent.

"Certainly no intelligent and disinterested man would imperil his standing as a logician by asserting that with our mints open to the free coinage of silver the European holder would consent to sell for less than its coin value, less, of course, the cost of transportation and insurance, because he could bring it to our mints and have it coined into standard silver dollars of equal purchasing and debt-paying power with gold.

"We are met here with the argument, or, more properly speaking, I should say subterfuge, because it does not rise to the dignity of argument, that free coinage would bring to the United States the surplus silver of Europe and gold would be driven out. This it is said would be due to the operation of the Gresham law, and notwithstanding it has been repeatedly met and shown to be unsound, it is persistently and dogmatically asserted. History is against the statement. We had free and limitless coinage of silver from the foundation of the Government to 1873, and silver bullion and silver coin were of equal value and worth 3 per cent more than gold at the time of demonetization.

"It is said again that up to that time we had coined not to exceed $8,000,000, but this is only a half truth. We had coined a little more than $8,000,000 in dollar pieces or disks, but we had altogether $150,000,000 in silver coin, taking no account of the vast quantity of bullion that had been shipped to Europe to supply the demand there and of which we can obtain no reliable data. This bullion and even much of our coin went to European markets as a result of undervaluation here.

"Another fact of importance in refutation of the dumping argument, if I may be permitted to call it such, should not be forgotten, and that is, that after the passage in 1878 of the Bland-Allison Act and during the precise time our mints were coining silver under the provisions of that act and the Sherman Act of 1890, our supply of gold instead of diminishing and being expelled, as is now contended would be the case in the event of free silver coinage, actually increased about $236,000,000. Gold monometallists overlook or ignore this in their eagerness to overthrow silver.

"But I would like to ask any intelligent man this question: From whence will the silver come that is to flood the country and drive away gold under a system of free silver coinage? I assert, without the slightest fear of being successfully contradicted, that outside the Western Hemisphere there are not in the world 20,000,000 ounces of free silver. The truth is that Europe is now, and for years has been, experiencing great difficulty and depression in consequence of not being able to procure an adequate supply of silver, and when we shall be possessed of reason and patriotism sufficient to induce us to retrace our steps and again resume the limitless coinage of silver, as a result of that fact alone, every civilized nation will be compelled in self-defense to open its mints to the white metal.

"But suppose European silver should be thrown on us—dumped on us, as it is said—suppose it should be brought to our mints and coined into dollars of exact equality with our own, what would be the result? Surely it would be American money and the owner would be compelled to exchange it for American labor, or the products of American labor, and this would bring prosperity; this would afford our laboring people a much-needed and greatly desired opportunity to engage in unbroken labor at profit-saving wages.

"But the gold monometallist, blindly pursuing his false logic as fatally as a night moth pursues a lighted taper, asserts that the European silver owner would exchange his bullion for American gold, and, having reaped a large profit on his investment, would return to his own country to enjoy his gain. But can this be true? Let us for a moment examine the assertion, for it amounts to no more than an assertion. We have no law compelling a person to give another a gold dollar in exchange for a silver dollar. Such an agreement, if made between the holders of these forms of money, would be a matter of private contract, with which the Government could not constitutionally interfere, but there is nothing in the law requiring the exchange to be made.

"So it is said that silver could be taken to the Treasury and exchanged for gold; but this statement is likewise untrue. There is no law requiring or authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem silver coin in gold.

"Then what would the holder of silver coined at our mints from European bullion do with his money after obtaining it? I will tell you what he could do, and all he could do.

"He could return with it to his own country, in which event it would cease to be United States money and again become bullion, or he could purchase and ship American manufactured articles to be sold abroad; he could employ American laborers at high wages, or he could establish productive industries in our country and thereby increase the demand for American labor and advance wages; he could do any and all these things, and then, no doubt, some laboring man who had been out of employment for many months would dump—if the dumping process is to be indulged in—a sack of flour into his home, or some other necessary articles of which it had been deprived for a long time under the gold standard. And I ask you, in all candor and seriousness, if this would not be a blessing rather than a curse? Would it not be a blessing to the manufacturer, to the farmer, to the laborer, to all who toil and those who depend on work?

"But gold monometallists raise the cry of 'sound money,' which means, of course, the gold standard. They assert that we must have the 'best money,' which means, in their vocabulary, gold, and many who have long ago ceased thinking for themselves, if indeed they ever indulged in the luxury, join in the senseless clamor and stigmatize all desiring the free coinage of silver as repudiationists, cranks, and dishonest men. The most dishonest money that can be foisted on an unsuspecting people is the single gold standard. Gold has been appreciated fully 100 per cent above its nominal value by demonetization of silver and a short volume of currency.

"It has produced depressions, panics, enforced idleness, want, and squalor. The Populist party insists that we shall have honest money consisting of gold, silver, and redeemable paper, issued by the Government in sufficient quantity to restore permanent prosperity, develop industry to its greatest capacity, and afford all employment at remunerative wages, that they may discharge their duties to the country and their families in an efficient manner and earn enough by honest toil to lay the foundation of a fortune. A money that will enable them to do this is honest; a money that will not is not only unsound, but rankly dishonest.

"But I have not the time to discuss the principles of Populism as fully as I would like under ordinary circumstances to do. I can not ask you for the time, and I must content myself with general statements. I think that it will be entirely proper to direct attention to some things the ignorant have supposed and the vicious have asserted to be Populist doctrines, and that have no relation to the party. Populists are not socialists; the party is not paternalistic. It believes that scientific socialism is a Utopian dream incapable of realization, and it has no sympathy with that kind of socialism that borders on anarchy, and it has supreme contempt for anarchists, foreign or native born.

"This element of society must be restrained by the strong arm of the law if the Republic is to stand. The Populist is a party of enlightened and just individualism. It believes in the equality of all before the law and demands the enactment and enforcement of just laws in an honest manner for the advancement of society. Of course all government is, in a comprehensive sense, socialistic, for no government could otherwise exist; but ours must not be socialistic in the ordinary acceptation of the term.

"Nor does the Populist party believe in a limitless volume of irredeemable paper money. It believes in the free coinage of gold and silver, the money of the Constitution, supplemented by sufficient paper money, issued by the Government without the intervention of corporations, just as now exists, or as would exist if silver were coined on terms of equality with gold, and in a limited volume of full legal tender paper money, anticipatory of and redeemable in the revenues. To these ends and for these purposes its members of Congress have incessantly labored. They have labored to better the condition of all, and they have at no time advocated defenseless measures, or those that could properly be characterized as Utopian or impracticable.

"The Constitution confers on the Congress the exclusive power to coin money. It is a sovereign power and one in its nature calculated to advance or retard the interests of all, according to the manner of its exercise. Throughout our history no Administration had the temerity to permit private corporations to issue and circulate their notes as money until after the beginning of the civil war. It was permitted then only as a war measure and with the distinct understanding that at the restoration of peace they would disappear, but the promise not being kept, the volume of national-bank currency has been permitted to increase.

"The Populist party is arrayed in solid phalanx against national-bank notes and the usurpation of the power vested in Congress by the Constitution to issue money. It is in every conceivable respect objectionable. It is an abandonment of Congressional duty to the people, the notes issued can not be made legal tender, and the system turns over to corporations the monetary affairs of the nation, thus placing in their hands the people's weal and woe.

"National banks can, under the law, issue or retire their notes at will; they can contract or expand the currency at pleasure and always promotive of their own interest and to the detriment of the people. The power of contraction and expansion is of vital importance. A sudden expansion may inflate prices beyond the point of permanent prosperity, while a radical and sharp contraction should be equally certain to bring in its train loss of property, depression of prices, if not panics and general bankruptcy. The power to issue money is, of necessity, therefore, one that should be exercised by the Government in the interest of all, just as the sovereign power to impose taxes should be exercised by the Government in the interest of the people.

"As well might Congress farm out to private corporations the right to make judicial decisions in cases now committed by our form of government to the judiciary, or the right to levy and impose taxes, or the discharge of any other constitutional duty that is by its nature and the language and policy of the Constitution committed to the Government.

"Seeing evil accumulating and wrong and oppression resulting as consequences, and that Republican and Democratic parties were committed to their continuance, and were taking no steps to remove them, the Populist party, made necessary by the exigencies of the times, came into existence, calling loudly for a return to constitutional government in the interest of all.

"Populists urge that money shall be increased sufficiently to bring permanent individual and national prosperity; not that there shall be a sudden expansion nor a limitless volume of paper money put in circulation; not that anything radical shall be done, but that the Government, profiting by experience, shall cause a steady and healthy expansion of the money volume to a point where the greatest prosperity can be produced.

"We have in our own country, as an example, the time immediately following the close of the war, when the circulating medium was over $52 per capita. Never in the history of the country had there been more material prosperity and general happiness than then, notwithstanding we had just emerged from a bloody and devastating war. It is the hope of Populists that the volume of money will be increased, that it will keep even pace with the increase of wealth and population, and that every dollar will at all times be of equal purchasing and debt-paying power and perform its proper office in the commerce and the industry of the world.

"I have not the time to discuss these questions extendedly or minutely, nor you the patience to listen, but I may be permitted in passing to note a misstatement frequently made that the Populist party favors a limitless volume of irredeemable paper money. The assertion is unfounded and made through ignorance or mendacity. There is nothing in the platform or traditions or teachings of the party that can lead honest men to that conclusion. On the contrary, we repel the thought of a limitless paper money. We favor a currency issued directly by the Government, increasing the circulating medium by safe and healthy means to a point productive of the highest individual and national prosperity.

"The Populist party favors the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people; this is a cardinal article of its faith. Certainly no man conversant with the methods employed in debauching legislatures in the election of United States Senators will deny that there should be a change for the better. Legislative elections are foreign to the spirit of our institutions and the rights of the masses whose interests are directly involved. On every line of our national history, in every tradition, in every provision of the Constitution speaking of elections, the fact is apparent that the people are supreme and have the primary right to select their rulers. It may be noted with pride that the present Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections have reported favorably a proposed constitutional amendment requiring the election of Senators by popular vote.

"Government ownership of railroads, telegraphs, and telephones is a doctrine of the party. That such ownership is necessary I think none conversant with the history of railroading will soberly deny. Of course those interested in private ownership, their press, their agents, and their attorneys, will decry the doctrine and use the influence they may possess, or purchase, to defeat its accomplishment. But I think no disinterested person will deny the necessity. A railway is an improved highway, and highways belong to the sovereign power in this and in other countries. Railroad, telegraph, and telephone companies have power to take private property for their own use by virtue of the constitutional doctrine of eminent domain.

"If they were not quasi public corporations they could not do so, notwithstanding they might be willing to pay more than it is worth. It is on account of the public service they are supposed to render that they are authorized to construct their lines from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific Seaboard. They are in their nature monopolies; they are few in number, and competition is unknown among them. They are indispensable to all, promotive of civilization, and it is clearly within the power, as it is within the line of true policy, for the Government to reduce them to ownership. No one will deny that Congress possesses the power to acquire these public agencies but those not familiar with the doctrine of eminent domain or the necessity of its application.

"We are asked by what right the Government can reduce these public agencies to its ownership. I answer, by the same power they exercised in securing private property on which to construct their lines—the right of eminent domain. When it shall be made to appear to Congress that public ownership of railroads, telegraphs, and telephones is essential to the general welfare and happiness of the people, that body will be found to have ample power under the Constitution to enact laws to that end, and obtain title by paying the owners the fair value, to be ascertained in an authentic manner.

"But it is sometimes urged that this would be paternalism, and paternalism is abhorrent to the ignorant and the greedy. Paternalism can not exist without a patriarch, and Government ownership is nowhere considered paternalistic. It finds its similitude in turnpikes, plank roads, canals, and other public works built, owned, and operated by the States. Many States built and operated railroads, and Georgia now owns and operates a railway profitably. It is not to be forgotten that 60 per cent of the nations of the world now own and operate the railroads, telegraphs, and telephones in the interest of the people and to their great advantage and profit. Government ownership is by no means a new or untried fact. It has existed since the earliest period of railway construction.

"It is said, again, that Government ownership would result in introducing into the public service 800,000 men, that would be a menace to the Government, inasmuch as they would use their influence and vote to continue in power the party from whom they received their appointment. But this statement has no substance. There would be no greater danger from that source than is experienced from the Army and Navy, the postal, or any other Government departments employing large bodies of men, and a judicious and honestly administered civil service would reduce the danger to a minimum.

"But, my fellow-citizens, after all has been said and done, beneath all these great questions lies the primal truth that prosperity depends on the condition of our laboring people. Labor is a natural condition and is enjoined by divine law as well. If there is any power among the forces of man, if there is anything more than another to which civilization and humanity are most indebted outside of Divinity itself, it is to labor. According to Biblical history, labor was first imposed on man as a punishment. It was evening in Eden, and the law of God had been broken; the greatest court that ever sat on earth was in session.

"The indictment had been read and the plea of guilty entered, and God passed sentence on Adam that 'the earth shall be barren, thorns and thistles shall it bring forth; in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread.' That was more than five thousand years ago, while the world was young, and Adam, the first man, and Eve, the first woman, when the sentence was received, went forth together in the world and forever left behind them the trailing vines, the fragrant flowers, the sparkling waters, the cooling shades, the rest and the repose, the quiet and the loveliness which belonged to God's chosen spot on earth. And man's labor then began, and during all the years that have intervened the hum of industry has not ceased.

"History records the battles of great armies, the achievements of mighty generals, and tells of the rise and fall of kingdoms, the birth and overthrow of nations. But during all the years we learn little of the men who patiently took up the burdens of humble life; of those whose labor fed the world; of those who toiled in the darkness of the mines, and built the cities and reared the mighty castles and proud palaces where kings and princes have taken shelter; of the men who stood by flaming forge and beat the heated iron into shape. Few, indeed, are the pages dedicated to the cause of human labor. Monuments of enduring granite and polished marble may rise and mark the spot where a battle has been fought and won, or the resting place of some great leader or imperial king; but during all the centuries the great force of labor has gone forward, not stopping to rear its monuments or mark the spots of its victories and its achievements.

"Labor needs no monument of crumbling stone or rusting iron to call the world to stop and read what she has done. Her handiwork is everywhere stamped on earth; it is written on the ages; her stalwart sons have reared the homes, from the humblest cottage to pretentious palace, where men and women have been sheltered from the storm and from the sun. They have built and manned splendid fleets of commerce that in safety plow the deep; they have seized the elements and made them servants of their will; they have bound together States and nations with strong bands of iron; they have felled the forests and caused golden grain to grow and ripen where wild beasts roamed before; they have delved in mines and penetrated the bowels of earth and brought to light her richest treasures; they have spanned with huge arches of stone the rivers of the world.

"It is sad to contemplate that in every age and country, until recent times, manual labor was performed by men in servitude, not far removed from chattel slavery. The works of antiquity, the Egyptian pyramids, the wall of China, the classic remains of Athens and of Rome, tell their sad tales of the labor of the slave. The first statute enacted in England was six hundred years ago, making it a crime to ask for an increase of wages, but slowly society accorded the man who toils the privileges the Declaration of Independence declared to be the right of rich and poor, until man's power, like his work, is everywhere, and at last the law has set apart a day of the three hundred and sixty-five that constitute the year to be devoted to the cause of labor.

"Like all classes, labor has advanced its own conditions, and its progress has not always been marked with peace. When we consider its history, written in oppression and deeds of wrong, is it a wonder that at times labor, patient as it is, has shown signs of discontent? But she has progressed and triumphed over obstacles, and the time will come when mankind will recognize that all men are brothers.

"New and undefined as it may be, but rugged, mighty, and powerful, there has arisen a party whose teachings to some may sound strange. Its foundation rests on the cause of labor and the brotherhood of man, and it seeks to solve questions other parties have failed to solve—how to prevent unjust accumulation of wealth in the hands of the few; how to resist the encroachment of capital and of greed upon the rights of the masses, under names of trusts and corporations; how to find and remove the causes that have led to discontent and stifled the cry of hunger in a land of plenty. All these and many more things it seeks to do, and will in time, I trust, accomplish. Toward the ranks of this party the army of labor is advancing, and the question is asked by the sons of toil, Why should we, whose labor feeds the world, ourselves be hungry? Why should we, who stand from dawn of day to gathering night by moving loom and gliding shuttle, making the clothing of the world, ourselves be clothed in rags? Why should we, who build the dwellings, the halls, and the palaces of men, whose labor dots the world with homes, ourselves be homeless?

"The full extent of God's sentence of man was, 'In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread.' This was the height, the breadth, the depth of Heaven's law. It was never said of him who gave his toil to the advancement of the world, 'Thou shalt not have bread to eat.'

"There is not now, and there has never been, a time in the Republic's history when the ability of the American people to produce wealth enough for all was questioned; but there is arising a serious question—how the wealth produced may be so distributed that those who work may retain a fair proportion of the wealth they create. Let us hope that in the near future these questions will be settled as they ought.

"I say to you who toil in shop midst whirling wheels, or in depth of mine, in factory or in field, by desk and by counter, if you would keep your rights and better your condition, you should intelligently use the ballot given you by law. First know what legislation promotes your interests, then select as lawmakers men who will faithfully, with honesty and with fearless purpose, execute your will.

"I would deeply impress on your minds that civilization and the Republic are on trial. The responsibility is with the people. If they act wisely, and in their own interest discharge their duties soberly, patriotically, and intelligently, these inestimable blessings will survive and be transmitted to posterity for countless ages to come. If they fail, the Republic will crumble, civilization will perish from the earth, and liberty will be lost to them and those who are to follow.

"No man can truthfully say that he has performed his duty to his God, his country, or his family who fails to cast an incorrupt and intelligent ballot and to unite with his fellow-men in elevating the race and making it better, wiser, purer, and holier. Duty to God involves an honest and intelligent exercise of the elective franchise with which society has clothed us. In the purity and intelligence of the ballot and in the wisdom of its exercise is to be found the hope of the nation. From the masses come success or failure. Reforms do not extend downward, but upward, and the people must be vigilant and active in the preservation of their liberty. I commend to you the words of Curran:

"It is the common fate of the indolent to see their rights become a prey to the active. The condition upon which God hath given liberty to man is eternal vigilance; which condition if he break, servitude is at once the consequence of his crime and the punishment of his guilt."

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss in a general way the financial question. In the course of my service in this body, which has not been very short, I have never risen to a privileged question. I do not rise to that now. But for an article published in the press pretty generally I should not have interfered with the action of the Senate to-day. I am not oversensitive to criticism in the press, either addressed to me directly or to those with whom I associate, but there are some things which appear in the public press that I think may well be contradicted and disputed.

There has been going around in the press for some days—perhaps I might say ten days—a statement that seems to me to be a gratuitous insult to those who profess to believe on the financial question what I believe, and it shows to me that many of those who deal with this subject have no comprehension of its importance or its relation to the prosperity of the country or of the world. It is belittled by some to a mere question of partisanship and by others into a mere question of local advantage or local interest.

I hold in my hand an extract from a paper which I propose to read, without stating from what paper it is taken, because it has appeared in several. I wish Senators would give me their attention while I read this article. I do not know how it may affect others, but to me it has been exceedingly irritating.

It was known to the President and to his Secretary of the Treasury ten days ago that an organized campaign was about to be inaugurated for the purpose of causing a rupture between them. They were advised of what was going to be done and put in possession of not a few of the details. No effort was to be spared by representatives of the free silver forces to cause a split in the Cabinet and to shake the confidence and friendship which President McKinley and Secretary Gage entertain for each other. Warning was also given that the conspiracy was to extend to an attempt to find a vulnerable spot in Secretary Gage's personal character and business career.

Thus far events have proved the correctness of the "tips," and the two gentlemen most directly concerned have been watching with no little curiosity and interest the developments of the crusade against them. When Mr. Gage hung himself up as a target to be shot at by the free silver gunners, he realized that he would be subjected to more or less hard usage and schooled himself to meet any attack which might be made on him. Nothing in reason which could occur will disturb his equanimity. At the same time he is not averse to having the public understand the facts in the case as far as the public has a right to know them. This does not imply that he intends to engage in an unending series of denials of false and misleading reports which may be set afloat about him, but he has always acted upon the theory that the public is entitled to be treated with frankness and candor at all times by public servants. He has been frank to the public through all his business career, and there is no likelihood that he will change his ideas in that respect. If the occasion should ever arise which would call for his withdrawal from the Cabinet, the public will be fully advised of it, and it will get the first news of the fact from him and not through any roundabout channel.

Mr. President, there is a charge in this article against the free silver forces that I resent. There is an intimation in it which I believe to be untrue, and that is that the charge comes from the Secretary of the Treasury. I know for myself, and I think I can speak for my associates, that there is absolutely no truth whatever in that statement. We differ with the Secretary of the Treasury; we differ with the great Republican organization now in power. We differ with them, not on the personnel of the Chief Executive or any member of his Cabinet; we differ with them on a great fundamental question, a question that we believe underlies all other questions, a question the rightful or the wrongful solution of which we believe will affect our country as well as all the rest of mankind either favorably or injuriously. For myself, I resent the imputation that any position I have ever taken upon this subject was influenced either by local considerations or by party considerations, either because of my love for or my dislike of any individual, living or dead.

Mr. President, I have been for twenty years an earnest advocate of the bimetallic system and a firm believer that there would be no prosperity in this country without it; nay, more, that the very existence of the republican institutions is threatened by the adoption of the gold standard; and I may say here that I believe I have so presented it to the Senate and to the country that I ought not to be charged with a dirty insinuation made in the public press that I am moved by hostility to the President or that I am moved by hostility to his Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. President, there is no difference between the Republican party and its head. The Republican party is to-day the party of the gold standard. The head of the Republican party but reflects the sentiment of his great organization when he stands for gold. The Secretary of the Treasury but represents the Republican organization and Republican sentiment as a whole when he stands for the gold standard. There is no distinction or difference between the sentiments of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the President of the United States upon that subject. It would be indecent for me to say that the President of the United States has in his Cabinet an officer who differs with him on the great fundamental question with which his Department is especially called to deal. There is no self-respecting President who would keep in in his Cabinet a member of it who differed with him on such a fundamental question and principle. There is no self-respecting Secretary who would stay there. I do not mean to say that every Secretary must be in accord with his chief on every question, but he must be in accord with his chief on those questions with which the chief is called to deal.

I deny that there is any contest between the Secretary of the Treasury and the President, and unless the change was made by taking the Executive from some other political organization, I deny that any silver man of intelligence and integrity in this country believes that he would be better off by a change of the Executive. Before the last national Republican convention there were a number of distinguished Republicans who sought the Presidential nomination. Had any one of them been made the standard bearer of the Republican party, there would have been no difference in his attitude toward this question. When the present Executive was nominated his views on the financial question were well understood. We had been told in the public press for more than a year, on the authority of a man who stood nearer to him perhaps than any other man not in public life, that the President had emphatically declared that if the Republican party adopted a free-coinage platform he would not run upon it.

The platform of the Republican party was not an uncertain platform; there was no ambiguity in it; there was no possibility of mistaking it. It said:

> We are in favor of international bimetallism when the principal nations of the earth will yield their assent thereto; and, if that can not be done, we are in favor of maintaining the existing gold-standard system.

When that question was submitted to the convention, there were more than seven men who voted in favor of the gold standard where there was one man who voted against it, and a goodly proportion of those who voted against it marched out of the convention and out of that political organization.

Mr. President, that campaign was made upon the theory that this country was to be put upon the gold-standard basis in the event of the success of the Republican party. It was the great question in the whole campaign. I know that in some sections of the country much was made of this supposed pledge to secure international bimetallism. I know equally well that the great Republican press of this country, supporting the Presidential nominee, declared with practical unanimity that it was well known to everybody in the country that there could be no international bimetallism under the conditions prescribed in the platform. They said, "Great Britain will never consent to an international agreement; and when you say 'the principal commercial nations of the earth,' you have included Great Britain, and therefore you have excluded the possibility of an international agreement, although the party may be pledged to endeavor to secure it." That was, at the most, all that it could be supposed that the party had agreed to do—that it would endeavor to secure international bimetallism; but if that could not be accomplished, then the party was put upon the strong and solid ground, as they said, of sound money on the gold basis.

Mr. President, I am not going into the details of the late Presidential campaign. I mean to take up but a few moments of the time of the Senate. On some other occasion I may discuss the question more fully. But every utterance made by the Republican candidate on the cottage porch from the day he received notice of his nomination, including his reply to the chairman of the national Republican committee when he received congratulations on his success, was in favor of the gold standard, and was an accusation against all who did not agree with him that they were disloyal to good government, that they were colluding with socialists and anarchists, and that they were engaged, as was said by a distinguished Senator who is in my eye, in a crusade of dishonor. Every utterance, I repeat, from the cottage porch was in accord with that declaration, and when, as I have said, a subcommittee of the national committee of the Republican party congratulated the President-elect on his success, he again repeated the statement and spoke of the men who had voted for him as if they were the people of the United States.

Mr. President, had anybody a right to suppose that this would not be a gold-standard Administration? To say otherwise would be to say that the President of the United States was a cheat and a fraud. We expected it; we predicted it; we said the platform would be in favor of the gold standard. We said you can not get international bimetallism. An effort has been made to secure international bimetallism, and it has failed, and failed because Great Britain would not take part in it. It would doubtless have succeeded if Great Britain had consented to enter into the arrangement. It may be said by some that the negotiation has not failed. I believe that it has.

I notice that the committee or commission or body, or whatever they may be called, headed by a late member of the Senate, which have been in session attempting to arrive at something which they might present to us in the way of financial legislation, have declared officially that it has failed. If anybody has still a lingering hope that Great Britain will agree to anything which will bring international bimetallism, I would not discourage him, because nothing would so delight me, nothing would give me so much satisfaction as to see international bimetallism accomplished by the consent and with the aid and assistance of Great Britain and the other great powers of the world; but I do not believe it ever can be so accomplished.

Is there any difference between the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States? The President in his message to us at this Congress declared that there was $900,000,000 of governmental demands upon the gold in the Treasury; that we were under obligation—I do not know whether he claims that it is a legal or a moral obligation—to redeem $900,000,000 of our money in gold. The Secretary of the Treasury, with more detail, said we were required to redeem $930,000,000.

There has been something of an effort to make it appear that there was a difference of opinion between the Secretary of the Treasury and the President, and that has been the excuse for the article which I have read. If anybody will take the utterances of the President—and I do not intend to go over them in detail—and then take the utterances of the Secretary of the Treasury, he will find that they are substantially the same.

Mr. President, we had a commission sent abroad. The act creating that commission passed this body and, I believe, the other with absolute unanimity.

Mr. CHANDLER. With only 4 dissenting votes in each House.

Mr. TELLER. With only 4 dissenting votes in each House, the Senator from New Hampshire says. I did not remember there were even those. The President selected and sent abroad that commission. Nobody has any right to find fault with the commission. The commission went to Europe, and I shou'd like to say for myself here, as I have said everywhere, that if there was a failure, it certainly was not the fault of the members of the commission. While the commission was negotiating under the most delicate and trying circumstances under which men ever negotiated, the President sent to us on the 24th day of July last a message; and if there had theretofore been a possibility of success, from that moment it ceased.

There is not anybody so ignorant on this question that he does not know that there will never be an international agreement which is to include Great Britain and all the great powers until it is thoroughly understood in Europe that the American Government really desires and intends to have, if possible, an international agreement. When the President sent us his message on the 24th of July last with a suggestion that a gold-standard convention, which had met at Indianapolis in the January previous, had provided a method for solving the question, and advised us practically to accept that suggestion, that moment every intelligent man here knew that the work of our commission might as well close.

I might with a little labor, I suppose, read the declarations of the President made from time to time, and the declarations made by his Secretary of the Treasury, to show that they have been in complete and perfect harmony, but in the presence of those who have had the experience which members of this body have had it seems to me it would be useless to do so. We know well that if upon this great fundamental and interesting question a difference of opinion existed, there would be a vacancy in the Cabinet, and that somebody more in accord with the views of His Excellency would be called to occupy the position of Secretary of the Treasury. Until that occurs it is useless to talk about a difference between the Secretary of the Treasury and the President.

It may still be maintained by some that the Republican party as a party is not a gold-standard party and that it is still pledged to international bimetallism, and yet only a few days since the Secretary of the Treasury appeared before a committee of the House of Representatives with a scheme for refunding the bonded debt, for a new banking system, and for the retiring of the present Government paper and ultimately filling its place with national-bank notes. He went before that committee, not as I come before this body, without notes, but he appeared before it with his remarks written out. He said:

> The objects I have in mind in the series of provisions offered by me are four in number:
> 1. To commit the country more thoroughly to the gold standard, remove, as far as possible, doubts and fears on that point, and thus strengthen the credit of the United States both at home and abroad.

That was the first proposition. He wanted to more firmly establish that system. He was not satisfied to maintain the existing conditions, but wanted to go beyond them.

> 2. To strengthen the Treasury in relation to its demand liabilities, in which are included greenbacks, Treasury notes, and the incidental obligation to maintain on a parity, through interchangeability with gold, so far as may be necessary, the present large volume of silver certificates and silver dollars.
> 3. To do this in such a way as not to contract the volume of circulation in the hands of the people.
> 4. To take an initial step toward a system of bank-note issues without the conditional deposit of public bonds as security therefor. If we prosper as a people, the revenue of the Government ought to be somewhat in advance of its expenditures.

He proceeds further, but I am now only dealing with his first proposition. The question of a bank system I do not care now particularly to dwell upon; but I shall take occasion to speak of it at another time. The bank system that he proposes to establish is to be established upon the theory of the gold standard. The President of the United States stated to us in his message that the Secretary of the Treasury had a plan for this purpose which he commended to our attention. I take it that that has had his approval, or he certainly would not have submitted it to us.

Mr. President, there was not long since in the State of Indiana—a State which gave to the present Executive its electoral vote at the last election—a notable assembly of Republicans. I do not know that it was presided over by a member of this body, but, if not so presided over, it was addressed by a member of this body. The statement in the public press was that there were from five to eight hundred of the most distinguished and representative Republicans of the State assembled, and, if I can judge from the declarations of the Senator who addressed them, one of the great questions with which they were concerned as Republicans in Indiana was: Is the Government going to establish and maintain the gold standard? They had come up from the rural districts and the cities of Indiana in order to assist in more firmly establishing the gold standard in the United States. If I may believe what has been stated in another place, which I perhaps ought not to refer to, there were two things which distinguished that body and interested it. One was to make sure that the Government was going to establish the gold standard and maintain it, and the other that there was to be some modification or repeal of the much-abused civil-service law.

I find a statement in the public press, undisputed and uncontradicted, that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS], who addressed that convention, delivered from the President of the United States the message which I shall read; and if it is not a fair report of what he said, I have no doubt the Senator will correct me. He is reported to have said:

> Our Democratic friends say to the old Democrats—
> I suppose he meant the gold Democrats—
> the Republican party will not keep faith with you; when the Republicans declared in favor of sound money at St. Louis they did not mean it. The Republican party, with McKinley as our leader, intends to keep faith, to preserve the gold standard unimpaired to the American people.

Oh, Mr. President, that is one of the inestimable blessings that you have secured with the result of the last Presidential election—to preserve unimpaired the gold standard—the gold standard which in this country and everywhere else it has been tried has been the greatest curse that was ever inflicted upon the human race. War and famine and pestilence have not equaled it in the calamity which it has caused to the human family. That is the inestimable benefit you have derived from the election of a gold-standard President and by putting into power a gold-standard party. But the faith is to be maintained. We knew that before; we expected it. We knew that the power which created this Administration would not let it back out if it wanted to; we knew that the power which created it would control it; and we knew it would control it for the gold standard. Let me read further:

> The currency question is a great question, and to it the President of the United States and his advisers are addressing themselves with ardor and intelligence. I saw the President but a day before coming here. I asked him if he had any message for the Republicans of Indiana. He commissioned me to say to you that he gratefully remembers the encouragement and assistance which the Republicans of this splendid State have given him heretofore, and he further said: "I am going to keep the bond. I am going to vindicate the sound-money plank in the St. Louis platform."

The Senator said, as I understand, and I again quote from the report of his speech:

> A party which keeps faith with the American people will, in my judgment, be supported and sustained by them. No party can afford to vary from its platform pledges the width of a solitary hair. At the coming session of Congress the great currency question will be in debate. I can not foretell what will be the result, for unfortunately we have a majority only in the House of Representatives. In the Senate the free-silver Democrats, free-silver Republicans, and Populists constitute a majority. Whether we can pass through the Senate any measure that will commend itself to the conservative judgment of the American people I can not say. But I do believe the American people will give us credit for an honest, determined effort, and that effort they will surely witness. If we fail, it will not be because of any lack of determination and perseverance in purpose on the part of the Republicans of the United States Senate.

With much of that I agree. I agree that a party which went before the people upon a certain platform ought to stand by it. I have no complaint against the Republican party for standing by their platform. What I complain of is that they deny that they are standing by their platform; what I complain of is that in one section of the country they proclaim themselves to be for the gold standard and in another they declare that they are not.

I admire the courage of the Secretary of the Treasury. He stands up and says, "I want you to understand that this bill is to force"—let me read his exact language, so that I shall not make a mistake:

> To commit the country more thoroughly to the gold standard.

The context shows that there is to be no doubt but that we are to be in the main upon the gold standard. I admire the courage of the Secretary. I am not likely to quarrel with a man of that kind on personal grounds. If there is anything I admire, it is the man who has convictions, who stands by them and backs them up, and takes the consequences of whatever follows. I hate and despise the class of people who say they are for the gold standard, but do not want the public to know it.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me to call his attention to a fact?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACON in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. ALLEN. At the precise moment when the Secretary of the Treasury was making the declarations in the other end of the Capitol which the Senator from Colorado has read the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] was advocating bimetallism here and declaring that the Republican party was committed to bimetallism.

Mr. TELLER. My relations with the Senator from New Hampshire are so close and of such long standing that I certainly would not refer to him in any way to embarrass him, and if he wants to say anything I shall certainly yield to him.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am very far from being embarrassed. [Laughter.]

Senators will remember that the only point I made—and I make it now against the Senator from Colorado, and wished the opportunity to make it, though I should not have interrupted him if the Senator from Nebraska had not done so—is that the President of the United States speaks for himself and is to be judged by his own utterances and not by those of a Secretary of the Treasury who only recently emerged from the party of the Senators upon the other side of the Chamber.

Neither is the President of the United States to be judged by what the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS], in the full flush and beginning of his work as an Administration Senator, enthusiastically reported to a meeting in Indianapolis. [Laughter.] The President of the United States has a right to be treated as a public official who speaks officially in public papers. The Senator from Colorado knows very well that President McKinley stands pledged by every utterance of his to maintain the platform adopted at St. Louis in this sense: The existing gold standard is only to be maintained until the time when international bimetallism can be secured.

Mr. President, one word more. The Senator from Colorado was willing the envoys should be appointed; he was willing to have the legislation of last winter put upon the statute book, and the Senator said then, and says now, that he is in favor of international bimetallism, and hopes it may be accomplished.

Mr. TELLER. No; I did not.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator said so.

Mr. TELLER. I said I was in favor of it. I did not say I hoped it would be accomplished. There is a very great difference between the Senator's position and mine.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator may explain that paradox as he may. He is in favor of international bimetallism, but does not hope that it may be accomplished. He therefore only makes the point, and emphasizes the point I was about to make, that the Senator and others like him are doing much to prevent the accomplishment of international bimetallism, standing exactly where Secretary Gage does, and possibly the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. President, it is no way to accomplish a great result through negotiations with foreign nations to proclaim the policy upon your statute books and by the appointment of envoys, and then to do all you can to prevent the international negotiations from being successful. I say it is no way to accomplish it to act in this way, whether it be a member of the President's Cabinet, or any Republican, or any Democrat, or any Silver Republican. I repeat, the language of the President in his message is what he is to be judged by, and in that he says that negotiations are now going on for international bimetallism. I hope the Senator from Colorado will do nothing to paralyze those negotiations.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from New Hampshire has no right, nor has anybody else on this floor, to call me in question concerning international bimetallism. There certainly is not more than one Senator here who has done more to secure international bimetallism than I have, and that is the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] who sits before me. Every time he has made a movement in that direction he has had my cordial and hearty support. I should very much like to secure international bimetallism. I knew when the Senator who sits before me returned from the trip he made to Europe, where he and others attempted to secure international bimetallism, that it was useless to longer continue that effort; and I believe that it was the general consensus of opinion of the people of the United States that there could be no hope of international bimetallism if it were made dependent upon the assent or approval of Great Britain.

We demonstrated that you could not get international bimetallism with Germany, France, and the United States. We demonstrated it when a Republican House of Representatives, with great unanimity in the last Congress, voted that they would oppose international bimetallism unless it should have the approval of Great Britain. By the Republican organization of that body voting against a provision that international bimetallism would be satisfactory if it included Germany, France, and the United States, they said, "No; we must have Great Britain." We knew then that it would not be accomplished, and when I say I am in favor of it, that is one thing. When I say I hope to get it, it means that I have expectation. Hope means a desire, with some reasonable expectation that the desire will be accomplished. I know, and so does the Senator, that this is a farce which he is keeping up as to international bimetallism.

The New York Tribune and the Chicago Tribune both declared after the national convention at St. Louis that it was well known that Great Britain would not be a party to our scheme of international bimetallism, and that the platform ex industria had included Great Britain for a purpose, or words to that effect. The Commercial Advertiser, a Republican paper, declared after the election that it was put in there to catch Western votes. I thought I had brought that particular article with me, but I see I have not. The declaration was that it was put in for the purpose of catching Western Silver Republican votes.

I will not discourage the Senator from New Hampshire. He may make all the efforts he can. When he got up his resolutions here last I voted for them, knowing that the result would be just what it has been, knowing that it was not within the power of the President to select a commission composed of the best men in this country who could accomplish that. I never found any fault with the commission. I do not now. They accomplished as much as anybody expected they could. They accomplished all that in my judgment there was any right to hope or expect they would. The Republican party knew full well in 1896 that it could not accomplish international bimetallism, and that it was put in as a sop to a few of us who had been contending for international bimetallism, and, if we could not get it, for national bimetallism.

If I had believed that you could get international bimetallism in four years under this Administration or any other, I would have remained in the political organization to which I have been attached during my whole political life; but I knew then that the Republican party was in the power and control of the men who did not mean to have international bimetallism or any other, and if the commission had come home with an agreement that India should open her mints and that the Bank of England should put one-fifth of its reserves in silver, I knew then as I know now that in a Republican House then elected you could not have passed an approving act of that character. I knew then as I know now that the men who poured out their money as money never was poured out in the history of any country in the world, who resorted to coercion and force, to bribery and indecent acts, as no people ever saw or heard of, would not allow international bimetallism, nor would they allow national or any other.

I knew the great stake for which they were contending. It is for the control of the great industries of this country. It is for the control of the great avenues of commerce and trade. It is for the control of, and that they may take toll upon, all the energies and the skill of all our labor everywhere.

Mr. President, the money power is the great power that has been felt all over the world. It is the power that to-day allows the murders in Armenia. It is the power that allows the wickedest war that was ever carried on against men to be carried on in sight of our shores, because it is feared that to do otherwise would disturb commerce and trade. On one occasion Hume said that the time would come when the salvation of the dividends would make it necessary that we cease to consider the honor and safety of this country.

Mr. President, you are there to-day. You are where the salvation of commerce and trade and the maintenance of a steady market for stocks and bonds render it impossible for the American people to assert their manhood. You compel them to belie their history and their record and to see the most stupendous crime of a hundred years perpetrated without governmental protest in defiance of your Republican platform. The American people will never emerge from the present condition until they say, "We, a people of 75,000,000, are big enough and strong enough and wise enough to manage our own affairs." As long as you yield to England either in finance or in your foreign policy you will not succeed.

I did not mean when I got up to say the hundredth part of what I have said, but I will say a little more since I have touched on this question. I have lived during the greatest period of American history. When I came to manhood's estate the people of this country were few in number; our resources were exceedingly limited. I have seen the country grow. I have seen it expand, and I have seen not only here, but throughout the world a development in fifty years with which no two hundred years, nay, no four hundred years, of the world's history can compare. I have been proud of my blood. I have been proud of the American people. What have we not accomplished? In all the world there is no history like ours. We began a feeble folk, on the coast, with the great interior filled with savages. We began right. We began with a declaration that every man is a man and that men are better than money; that the great purpose and object of government is the protection of men. Nobody then dared to say that the interests of trade and commerce should not give way to the liberty and freedom of men.

Gradually we have grown until to-day we are the greatest people in the world. No other nation has 70,000,000 homogeneous people. No other nation has the resources and the wealth of ours. Is it not time that this great nation, sitting between the two great oceans, having more natural advantages of position than any other country in the world, should at least be able, when our sympathies dictate and when our interests demand, to say to a little fifth-rate country like Spain, "Take your hands off the gem of the seas! Take your hands off that beautiful island! You have already killed one-third of its population. You must now stop"? Oh, Mr. President, the salvation of the dividends, the price of bonds and stocks, and the fear of war!

I am one of those who did not vote for the arbitration treaty. I have heard myself branded in a public sermon as a man in favor of war. I heard a distinguished bishop of one of the great churches, for which I have attachment, say that the period has come when nobody is in favor of war save the Turk and the United States Senate. In the secrecy of the Chamber I voted against the arbitration treaty. I did not vote against it because I wanted war. I voted against it because it was an indecent attempt on the part of the last Administration and the British Government to bind the hands of this body and the American people. I voted against it also because I realized that there are infinitely worse things than war; because I know as a student of history, and so do we all, that no nation which lost its warlike spirit ever maintained its independence. Independence abides only with the men who go to war when there is necessity for it, when the freedom or the interest of their country demand it. He who skulks and hides when there is threat of war is not a freeman and never will be, and will not defend the freedom of himself or his fellows. I do not believe there would be war if we put our hands upon Cuba, but if so, let it come.

The French King, possibly not entirely out of sympathy with us or with republican institutions, was willing to brave the anger of Great Britain and come to our relief. I do not think I state an unreasonable thing when I say that it is exceedingly doubtful to-day whether we would have won our independence from Great Britain without that aid. Later when the French threw overboard the King, and France reached a condition of turmoil and strife, absolutely the logical consequence of the former position, the direct result of the atrocities committed on the people by the French Government, when it reached a condition that was pandemonium and our great first President felt there was danger that the affection of this country would lead it to an affiliation with France, he issued that famous proclamation of his of a hundred years ago addressed to the people of the United States, in which he said that we must make no entangling alliances with a European power.

He addressed that to the people of this country to prevent Jefferson and his associates from making a combination with France, as he feared they might when he went out of power. It had nothing to do with any other country than France. He said: "Maintain this condition for a while, and then," he said in substance, for I do not quote him exactly, "you will be big enough to go to war when you want to; you will be big enough to go to war when your interest will be promoted by going to war, or you can maintain peace when your interest lies in that direction." To-day when, in accordance with the Republican platform, we do express some sympathy for Cuba, we are told: "Oh, Washington said 'Do not get into any entangling alliances,' and we must keep clear."

Bad as the government is there now, we will see an infinitely worse one put there, and 73,000,000 people, with more interest in the island than any other people in the world, in the interests of the salvation of the dividends will keep quiet, and in order that they may defend themselves against charges of their poltroonery and cowardice say that a hundred years ago George Washington said you ought not to engage in any entangling alliances.

The Republican party is in power. I attack it first upon the ground that it is a gold-standard party, and I will destroy it if I can. I hope to see it go down in defeat in 1900, and, if living, I pledge you my word I will do everything I can to bring it to grief. If it were right on the money question, I could not myself tolerate this treatment of these people on our border. The cowardly—I will use the term—the cowardly policy of this Government and the cowardly policy in international affairs are not according to my notion of Americanism or of that which befits the dignity of a great and free people.

I want to repeat that I have no quarrel with the President of the United States. My quarrel is with the Republican organization. You can not bring prosperity to this country, if prosperity is only to be brought by change of policy on the financial question, by changing one Republican President for another, or one Republican Secretary of the Treasury for another. So far as I know, the present Secretary of the Treasury is as much a Republican as is the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]. He is absolutely in accord with every sentiment of the platform, it seems to me, except upon the question of Cuba; and when his chief takes the lead, nobody need complain if he follow.

When I rose I intended to say but a few words. At some other time I mean to say something about the foreign policy of this country. I have seen in the press some criticism of things I have said about our attitude toward China. I am not afflicted with Anglomania or Anglophobia. I want no entangling alliances, and yet I would have the same kind of entangling alliances about the country over there that we had with Mr. Canning about South America. I would say to Great Britain, and I would say it in a way that she would understand, "We will join you in a protest, and if it comes to the worst we will join you in any efforts you may make to maintain the autonomy of China, of Persia, Afghanistan, and Beloochistan, all now threatened by the great Russian Bear and Germany and France combined."

I should see to it, not in the interest of trade alone, but in the interest of the human race and in the interest of my own American people, that those great powers do not dismember that country, and are not allowed to go into it, with the result that it, with its great population and activities, should become competitors with us and competitors with our own Christian brethren throughout the world.

We need not go to war. A word from us to Russia would suffice. As Mr. Seward said when the Austrians were sending their troops to Mexico, "Say to the Austrian Government that the United States will not be a neutral observer of any further export of troops from Austria to Mexico," so I would say to France, to Germany, and to Russia, and I would say it if England were in the combine, which, thank God, she is not, "Hands off; let the autonomy of that country remain as it has been for more than four thousand years."

But it will not be done. I repeat, the salvation of the dividends will control this Administration, as it controlled the past. I have so many complaints against the Republican organization on many grounds that I need bring no accusation against the personnel of the Administration. I want to say here that I never did debate any question on that line, and I shall not in the future. I shall accord to the President of the United States that which belongs to him. Whenever he performs an act that is in consonance with my ideas of justice and right, it shall have my support. I shall be as free to criticise him as any other man, but I shall not criticise him in a spirit of partisanship or of mere fault-finding; and if he is for the gold standard, I am against him, but I am against him as a representative simply of the organization that he truly represents when he says he wants more firmly to establish the gold standard in the United States.

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. TURNER. Unless some other Senator desires to discuss the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska, I will ask the indulgence of the Senate to call up the immigration bill for the purpose of enabling me to submit some remarks thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 112) to amend the immigration laws of the United States, be now taken up, in order that he may submit some remarks thereon. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. President, I shall be compelled to absent myself from the Senate for a time after to-day and may not be able to return until after the debate on the pending measure shall have been concluded. I take this occasion, therefore, the only one that will be presented to me, to make some observations on that measure, and I do it more for the purpose of putting myself on record than with the idea that the brief and desultory remarks which I shall permit to myself on this occasion can have influence in fixing the views of Senators on the very important question treated of by the proposed legislation.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the pending measure and sincerely hope it will not become a law. I am not in favor of an educational qualification as a prerequisite to the right of persons of foreign birth to come into our country. Such a proposition runs counter to every idea that I have ever entertained of the relations borne by our people to the people of the balance of the world, and, if adopted into law, would falsify a record which, in my estimation, constitutes one of our country's chiefest beauties and glories.

I am not unmindful, I hope, of the advantages of mental cultivation in those who are or may become domiciled in our midst, whether native or foreign born, but to say that those only who have some degree of education in letters may land on our shores is, in my judgment, to exalt an important, but not indispensable, incident into the position of an essential and overruling factor. The essential factors in the problem of immigration, as I view it, are those of health and virtue. Given these and any man or woman is desirable as a resident, and may in course of time become a useful and valuable citizen.

I am so impressed with the impolicy of the proposed legislation, and with its departure from the broad and liberal spirit which has hitherto guided our legislation on the subject, that I can not forbear to express my astonishment that it should be gravely and seriously pressed in either branch of the National Congress.

Ignorance of book learning is indeed a misfortune, but it is not a crime. It is a misfortune, moreover, in persons of foreign birth, to which many if not most of those who suffer from it contributed nothing. They are ignorant because it pleased the Almighty to plant them on a barren soil and under an inclement sky; because it pleased Him to cast their lot among the hewers of wood and drawers of water, who, as a result of cruel and niggard policy of their native land, are left in ignorance and darkness. Why this policy is and has been pursued I need not now stop to inquire. That it is so is well known.

Many of the countries of the Old World from which we draw a large immigration not only furnish no educational facilities to the masses of their people, but they do not consider it wise or safe to do so. Is it not commendable in the victims of such a policy that they should seek to escape from the cruel conditions which have hitherto enthralled them? Is it not an earnest of their worth, of their striving after better things, of their capacity to be and to do better things, that they should endeavor to escape these conditions? And when in that endeavor they approach the shores of this great Republic, the asylum of the oppressed of every land, are they to be told by the ministers of our law that their misfortune is and must remain irremediable?

Mr. President, the springs of Christian charity and humane benevolence in this country, so copious in the past, have not suddenly dried up and ceased to flow. The people of this country will not approve such a policy. For myself, I would as soon refuse food and drink to the hungry and thirsty as to push away from our shores the poor, struggling unfortunate who seeks for himself and his children the boon of freedom and enlightenment at our hands. Such a course is not in accord with the policy of this country, with the spirit of the people of this country, with the genius of our institutions, or with the history and the traditions of our Republic.

What necessity has arisen in these later days for this proposed change in the traditional policy of the Republic? If there be, in fact, such a necessity, then we ought to bow to it, because the first right and duty of nations as of individuals, is that of self-preservation; but I deny that there is any such necessity. I have neither heard nor read a single argument in its favor which commends itself to my judgment or my conscience. Can it be said that education and learning form an indispensable equipment for the right of entrance into the privileges of the social compact? Have we reached a stage of development which emancipates us from the primal curse and enables us to supply our manifold wants at the expense of a mental effort? If not, then we need strong hands as well as learned brains, energy of action as well as energy of thought, and deft physical manipulation as well as profound mental calculation.

Has it been determined by the learned book men of this country that all virtue is concentered in learning and that our merit is to be measured by the extent of our information? That can hardly be maintained broadly, because it has always been considered an axiom that a little learning is a dangerous thing. The amount of learning which this measure requires is small indeed—just sufficient to create an invidious distinction without accomplishing any just or useful purpose.

The fact is that virtue does not necessarily go hand in hand with learning, however profound the latter. That jewel is not found at the seats of learning only, or amidst the wealth and culture of our cities. It may be found there, but it is more often found on the farm and in the factory, at the plow, the bench, and the counter, in the lowly cottage, where neither temptation nor unsatisfied aspirations come between man and his Maker.

Mr. President, it is far from my purpose to decry the importance of learning, either as an aid to moral culture or as an auxiliary to physical effort. I appreciate its importance, I hope, as much as any man. For the duties of citizenship I consider it essential, but I deny that its possession is or ought to be considered as indispensable to the right of entrance into our great national family.

I would gladly vote for an amendment to our naturalization laws requiring an educational qualification for those admitted to citizenship. I would consider that wise statesmanship. But I will never vote to deny to any man the protection of our laws and the benefits of our free institutions on the score of learning; such is not statesmanship.

I hesitate to characterize the pending bill as I otherwise would because of the high respect I have for the distinguished Senators who have reported the measure to the Senate. If I understand the report of the honorable Committee on Immigration correctly, it proceeds on the theory that vice and ignorance go hand in hand, and that in order to bar out the vicious it is necessary to bar out the ignorant. If the premise be correct, it would seem that the conclusion naturally follows. In order to sustain the premise the committee has collated a large mass of statistics and embodied them in its report. Of course it requires neither statistics nor argument to prove that the ignorant are more prone to vice than the learned, but it will require more statistics and stronger argument than the learned committee has indulged in to satisfy me that the untutored mind is so prone to vice, so steeled against virtue, that the rites of hospitality ought to be absolutely denied it. And that is the case which it is necessary to make out in order to sustain this proposed legislation.

I never have been able to bow down before the compelling power of statistics, as some men do. Statistics are simply figures, and a distinguished statesman of long ago said that there was nothing more fallacious than facts unless it was figures. Given a large mass of statistics from which to choose, with the ability to select such as suit our purposes and to reject such as do not square with our preconceived opinions, with a happy faculty for drawing unwarranted but specious conclusions, and one can prove anything. That is one reason, I imagine, why the political parties of this country to-day are so wide apart on simple propositions of political economy which one would suppose should meet with universal acceptance.

I wish to notice very briefly some of the statistics here. The first thing that strikes one in considering them is that many of them leave a great deal to the imagination, and all of them compel one to yield unwilling credit to the sources of information from which they were supposed to have been drawn.

Take Table No. 4, on page 6 of the report of the Committee on Immigration. It professes to be a "percentage, by nationalities, of immigrants to the United States from European countries over 14 years of age who can neither read nor write, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895."

Where the committee got these figures we are not told in the report, but one would naturally suppose that they were drawn from Table No. 1, which is a general statistical table on the subject of immigration to this country for the last eighteen years, and from Table No. 3, a table upon this same subject, which immediately precedes Table No. 4. But I have tried as hard as I can to make the results laid down by the committee in Table No. 4 conform to Table No. 1 and Table No. 3 without the ability to do so. They are imperfect and incomplete and carry but little weight with them, whatever may be said of the conclusions which are attempted to be drawn from them.

Table No. 5 shows how prone the human mind is, when dealing with this question of statistics, to draw conclusions from insufficient data when the conclusion accords with preconceived opinions. The committee give us an elaborate table called "Percentages of illiterates, by nationalities, arranged in order of percentages." One would suppose from the title that these percentages were the average dealt with in Table No. 1, when, as a matter of fact, if we look into it closely, we see that it is drawn entirely from Table No. 4, and has reference only to the immigration during the year 1895, presented in Table No. 4.

We see the same tendency to exaggerate the importance of isolated data in the tables prepared under the heading of distribution of illiterate immigrants. The Immigration Restriction League, whatever that may be, visited Ellis Island, in the harbor of New York, on three days in December, 1895, so the committee tell us, and examined about 1,000 immigrants who came into this country during those three days.

From the results of that examination made by this unofficial organization on three days during the year 1895 we have elaborate tables drawn out here on "Destination by nationalities," "Destination by percentages," "Illiteracy of nationalities," and "Destination of illiterates." I have no doubt the Immigration Restriction League detailed truthfully the facts which they found by examining the immigrants, but the trouble is that it does not prove anything. Nobody can draw any deductions from an examination made upon three days of immigrants coming into our country during that limited period, and it seems to me to be absurd to parade statistics drawn from such quarters as evidence of the necessity of restricting immigration in this class by legislation.

The only statistical information that I consider accurate and as carrying with it the conclusions which are attempted to be drawn is that taken from the report of the Commissioner of Labor for the year 1894 and from the census report for the year 1890. The former of these tables shows that the slum population of our larger cities is composed largely of persons of foreign birth; and the second that a large proportion of the persons of foreign birth resident in this country are concentrated in the Eastern and Middle Atlantic States of the Union.

This data is no doubt accurate, and it is perhaps a misfortune that the facts are such that the conclusions which are drawn can be said to be truthful; but I do not consider that militates very much against the desirability of foreign immigrants who come here without education.

The Committee on Immigration certainly do not expect these poor people, fresh from an immigrant ship, to congregate on Fifth avenue, New York, or Beacon street, in Boston. They go where they can; and as "the slums" is a very elastic term, I have no doubt that the slums of our large cities are recruited very largely from our foreign population.

It seems reasonably certain, too, that the same cause will for an indefinite period bring about a congestion of our foreign population in the Eastern and the Middle Atlantic States of the Union. But that is not a matter of preference. On the contrary, any immigrant coming to this country and understanding our conditions would infinitely prefer the West to the East. If it were a matter of choice with him, I should expect to see him immediately after landing proceed to Washington or Montana or some one of the far Western States, and there, where genial nature and a genial people hold out to him hospitable hands, make a home for himself and his children. He doubtless would do this, instead of stopping in rock-ribbed New England, or already overcrowded New York, or even that political Mecca, the great State of Ohio; but, unfortunately, he goes not where he will, but where he can, and for him the vision of a home in the boundless West is for a long time nothing but an unsubstantial dream.

But, if he does nothing else, he accomplishes one useful purpose by remaining in the Eastern States. He pushes out into the great Western world the young men and women of the East, the sons and daughters of refinement and culture who so largely form the population of that region. They are there to-day hewing an empire out of chaos and building up a civilization of which the parent States may well be proud.

If, in communing with nature and nature's God, their thoughts and their impulses have been broadened out so that they can take a clearer and more generous view of the public questions of the day than their fathers, it is simply repeating on the Pacific Coast that which happened on the Atlantic more than a century ago. Be assured, Mr. President, that that which the fathers wrought they will keep; but as they are not degenerate sons, they will keep it in the fullness of the spirit in which the fathers wrought it.

Quite a large proportion of our native population is illiterate. It must be confessed that quite a large proportion of that which we receive from abroad is similarly circumstanced. While not the most useful or distinguished of our people, it can not be said of this class that they have so signally failed of useful effort during the one hundred and twenty years of our national life that we are now justified in putting a ban upon them.

On the contrary, we could not have done without them. The class of men who were the pioneers of our civilization in its westward march were largely men of little, if any, learning. But they blazed the pathway that others followed, and when pressed too hard by the trammels of a superior culture they pushed on and on until the entire continent, largely as a result of their efforts, yielded itself to useful purposes and to good government.

This class has done its part reasonably well, both in peace and in war. The officers on neither side during our late war undertook to recruit their armies with a spelling book. They knew too well that courage and endurance were not bred in the schools alone. In every contest which our country has had, whether internal or external, it has been proven that men may be heroes although untutored in the polite learning of their more fortunate brothers.

Every class of our population has done its part in building up this great Republic and our magnificent civilization. The time has not yet come when we can do away with any part of it, when we can refuse to receive, or honor, or distinguish any part of it. We have yet many battles to be fought in this country. That with stubborn nature is never ending. That with hostile men may come to-day, or to-morrow, or at any time, and no man can foresee its end. In the one contest I apprehend that our generals would prefer good red blood corpuscles in the rank and file to bulging brows and shrunken limbs, and our statesmen would be wise if in the other contest they recognize the importance of virile manhood in the effort to subdue nature to wise and orderly government.

I am aware that there is a clamor from certain quarters for a restriction of immigration on general grounds. It is thought that our population is already overcrowded and that the stress of competition lessens the rewards of labor. Members and Senators are importuned by portions of their constituents to adopt any expedient which will cure the supposed evil. I imagine that it was this pressure, in large part, which resulted in the framing and the offering of the present bill. Indeed, the committee confess as much in the first paragraph of the report which accompanies the bill in the Senate.

But I am not in favor of giving way to clamor, however urgent it may become, unless I believe it to be wise and just. I do not believe that this country is overpopulated. I do not believe that it can ever be said to be overpopulated until its people have reached a stage of density greater than that of any other people on earth, because in no other country has nature been so lavish and so diffuse in her bounties. Given these conditions, every addition of human energy not only adds to the potential wealth of the nation, but it adds to the prosperity, and the comfort, and the convenience, and the happiness of all the people of the nation.

A country which annually sends abroad breadstuffs and food products and textile materials in a crude state sufficient to feed and clothe its entire population can not by any possibility be said to have an excess of people. There may be certain crowded and populous centers in which it can be said that there is an excess of people, although I do not believe it; but if so, the remedy which is here proposed is not the remedy which ought to be adopted by our National Congress. Our statesmanship is far inferior to that of the earlier and less cultured days of the Republic if exclusion is the only or the best remedy that can suggest itself.

A better remedy, if I might be permitted to suggest, would be to put the people of this country to work. Give us a wise and a just economic system which will insure labor its fair reward, not only in the factory but on the farm. Do that, and the engorged population of our great centers will soon be remedied, and those centers will reach a normal and a healthy condition.

I have very firm and fixed ideas on the subject of what that economic system should be, but I do not propose to unfold them to the Senate at this time. It is far from my purpose in discussing this measure to engage in a discussion of partisan politics. It is sufficient for my purpose without touching upon the politics of the day to say that all parties contend, and honestly believe, I have no doubt, that were their political system adopted and put into force in this country, prosperity would immediately return to us, and there would be a wealth of work and labor for all the people of the country.

I am willing to accept as true that which all parties claim to be true. I claim it is manifest, therefore, that a Chinese wall of exclusion is not what we need in this country at the present time.

England supports in comfort and happiness a population nearly one-half as great as our own upon a territory little larger than one of our average Western States, and upon resources not one hundredth part our own. It needs no argument to prove that the form of our government is certainly as wisely ordered as theirs. If, then, we fail where England succeeds, the fault is not in our country, not in our form of government, but in our administration. It is wise statesmanship to turn our attention to that. It is much better that we should endeavor to remedy the disease rather than attempt to combat the symptoms.

If I might be permitted to point out some of these evils of administration, without appearing to be censorious, I would say that our past legislation has been too much in the interest of moneyed corporations and aggregations of capital and not sufficiently in the interest of the people of this country. Some public men seem to believe, honestly, no doubt, that the first duty of government is to concrete wealth and the instrumentalities which produce wealth, and in the hurry of our marvelous national development too many of us have been disposed so act upon that theory.

But the truth is that the little finger of one of our people is of more importance to Government than the wealth of a province. When this fact is not borne in mind in our legislation, it is very easy for the best of governments to become onerous and burdensome to the people, and that, I am sorry to say, is the case with ours to-day.

We have want and suffering in the midst of plenty, which make men clamor for revolution when all they want and all they need is a reform in administration, in the broad sense of that term—a reform they have it in their own power to bring about whenever they choose to exercise that right and that power.

One result of this indiscriminate legislation in the interest of capital is seen in the railroad situation in this country as it exists to-day. I apprehend that if our statesmen of other days could have seen that condition as it exists to-day, they would not have been so lavish and prodigal in the grant of powers and franchises to railroad corporations, because in doing so they have imperceptibly parted with a governmental function of the most important character, and vested it in hands where it will be and can only be used for private and selfish purposes.

One of the most important functions of government in all times and ages and among all peoples has been the right to build up, own, and control the highways of the country. Our public men have parted with that function to the railroads, and the railroad corporations to-day tax at will seventy million people for the privilege of using the public highways. That that power should be used selfishly and exactingly, overbearingly and cruelly, to the people of this country was only what might have been expected would be the result of conferring it. No individual ever yet exercised a governmental power granted to him for private gain wisely and well, and he never will so long as human nature is as weak and frail as it is to-day.

The robber barons of the Middle Ages were not more ruthless in their forays upon the unwary traveler passing along the roads beneath their castles than these railroad barons of to-day are in their forays upon the general public. Their rule in the West has been to reach down into the pockets of the farmers as deep as they could and take therefrom every dollar and every penny left over and above the cost of production. The farming population of my State has been ground in the dust by the exactions of these great, monstrous railroad corporations, raised up by the voice of the law, without the proper safeguards to enforce a due respect for the rights and interests of the people.

Our people have been ground into the dust, I say. The rule out there has been—and there has been no denial or attempt to conceal it—to make their tariffs so as to draw from the traffic every cent that it will bear. The result has been that farms and their appurtenances and farm products became a drug in the market, and the farmers of my State were seriously considering the advisability of giving up their homes and moving to other places where they could engage in other occupations for a livelihood.

But more than all this, and worse than all this, is the power that they exercise over the prosperity of towns and cities and communities by unlawful advantages and unjust discriminations. Whenever it has been to their advantage to do so, they have never failed to exercise this power ruthlessly, and while they possess it they never will, and they never can, be prevented from exercising it in that way.

I have seen flourishing cities and towns and villages in my State absolutely killed by the frown of these railroad magnates, and I have seen other cities and towns and villages, that had but little excuse for being in existence, made flourishing by the summer sun of their favor. I have seen one little city of a thousand people, which would compare favorably with any city of the same size in the United States, with its beautiful homes, its shaded streets, its flowers and its shrubbery, its fruit trees, its school-houses, and its churches, literally torn up by the roots and moved bodily 5 miles to a bleak and barren plain to feed the greed and rapacity of one of these great transcontinental railroad corporations, and the Supreme Court of the United States said that the courts were powerless to prevent the consummation of that gross outrage. When people can be subjected to such merciless treatment as I have detailed by creatures of the law, can they not truly complain that their interests have not been properly safeguarded?

Of course the courts say that we still preserve to ourselves sufficient of the governmental function to regulate freights and fares. But if that be so, that power has never been adequately exercised. The interstate-commerce act stands a self-confessed failure. It has never yet coerced a single railroad company into doing justice where it did not want to do it, and it can never be used successfully for that purpose until it shall have been made as strong and forceful as these railroad companies are overbearing and lawless. Instead of the tendency being in that direction, however, it appears to be the reverse.

There is a measure pending in this body at this time, professedly in aid of the interstate commerce act, a measure which I consider monstrous. It is a measure which, in my judgment, ought to be characterized as one for the purpose of stifling competition and legalizing extortion; and the principal point of view from which I have heard this monstrosity discussed in any of the public prints or by any of the public men who have had occasion to discuss it was whether the confessedly unconscionable advantages which it gave to those railroad corporations were not more than compensated by the equality in rates which it would produce, and the consequent equality among the trading and commercial classes.

It appears to be assumed without question as a primary and conceded premise that two or more competing roads ought to be permitted by combination and agreement to wring such tolls from the people as, upon a division, will give each of them a fair return upon the capital invested in each of them, and this without reference to whether two or more railroads may not have recklessly intruded themselves into a territory where they were not needed, and which could be as well served by one railroad as by two or more. You may gloss it over as much as you please; you may attempt to cover it by involved reasoning; but I say that the rights and the interests and the safety of the people of this country can never be secured, either in railroad traffic or in any other kind of traffic, save and except by full and free and fair competition, and I submit that this matter and others of like character must be considered and dealt with from the standpoint of the people's rights and interests, if prosperity in its full measure is to return to our country.

Of a piece with this great railroad monopoly are the thousand and one other monopolies which have grown up as the result of favoring laws to kill competition, destroy trade, and legalize extortion. The trade conditions in this country to-day are as bad, if not worse than they were in England during the time of Charles I, when that monarch sold trade monopolies for the purpose of filling up his exhausted treasury. Colepepper, one of the members of the Long Parliament, said of those monopolies: "They sup in our cup; they dip in our dish; they sit by our fire; we find them in the dye vat, the washbowl, and the powdering tub; they share with the cutler in his box; they have marked and sealed us from head to foot."

Could language more adequately and fitly describe the condition of affairs in this great Republic on this dawn of the twentieth century? These same old monopolies still sup in our cup and dip in our dish and sit by our fireside. They are with us from the cradle to the grave—from the bottle of pap with which our infancy is nourished to the cerements which shroud us when we are taken to our last resting place.

That which cost the heads of a king and his ministers two hundred and fifty years ago is universal in this Republic of ours, controlled by the free voice of a free people. It boots nothing to say that the two conditions were not brought about by the same causes. The same results of misery and suffering and unhappiness exist, and the same measure of punishment will be meted out. Heads will fall in the basket, but the decapitation will be accompanied by no effusion of blood. Fortunately for us, the fathers of this Republic devised a scheme of government under which every evil, no matter how great, might be remedied without bloodshed and without harsh and lawless action.

Sir, I am not engaged in making an indiscriminate attack on the public men of this country in the discussion of this question. These great monopolies have grown up not by grant, but as the indirect result of favoring laws and natural conditions; not by the fault of the public men as a whole, or of any single individual in public life. The greatest and most onerous of these monopolies is the transportation monopoly, and that, more nearly than any other, approaches to being a monopoly by grant; but even the legislators who were responsible for that monopoly did not foresee the extent to which their legislation was about to be carried.

The monopolies in coal and iron and the other mineral and vegetable products of limited growth which have been formed in this country so numerously are the result of our favoring laws concerning aggregated capital without recognizing and remembering and limiting, as we ought to have done, the aggressions which we ought to have known capital would make upon the rights of the people of the country. The thousand and one monopolies which prick us like pins at every step that we take in our daily life are not even the result of legislation. They are the result of private combinations, aided by great wealth; they are conspiracies, private conspiracies, against the peace and good order of society, and ought to be punished as such. They are as much a menace to the happiness and the safety of the people of a country as were the indictable conspiracies at common law. The failure to discourage them by penal and restrictive laws is the only responsibility attaching to any persons in public life.

The evil effect of the conditions which I have been describing must be patent to everyone. The middlemen are being gradually squeezed out of existence and will soon take their places in the great army of wage workers. The small trader, the small farmer, and the small manufacturer have already been squeezed out. If these conditions continue to progress, the time is not far distant when there will be but two classes in this country—the employer and the employed. The people of the country do not favor such a condition and will not have it.

Even the argument of a cheapened production and consequent advantages to the people will not reconcile them to such a condition of affairs, because they know that there are no advantages in cheapened production if prices are not fixed by competition. Selfish greed never yet lightened the burden on the back of patient labor. Human nature is too weak and frail to warrant the hope that it ever will.

Let us go to work, then, Mr. President, patiently and intelligently, to remedy these hard conditions. That is all that the country needs. With all the tangible and intangible rights of the individual properly guarded, and with an economic system which places us on an even footing with the balance of the world, this country can support in comfort and contentment and happiness ten times its present population.

It is idle to talk about the necessity of restricting immigration on the ground that we already have too many people. We have not too many people, Mr. President. There are still vast stretches of unexplored and unimproved lands in this country waiting to be subdued; there are still millions and millions of acres of virgin soil which has never been pricked by the plow or the spade. Our forests are illimitable, and with proper care will prove to be inexhaustible. The wealth of coal and minerals of all kinds in this country has hardly been touched, and can never be worked out during the age of steam and steel.

Cities are yet to be built which will rival the most opulent and populous of the present day. Commonwealths are yet to be founded, or at any rate are yet in their infancy, which in time will vie with the strongest and most powerful of the States now composing the Union. Why, sir, we are just in the infancy of our development, and we never had greater need for people than we have to-day; and yet it is at this time that this cry for restricted immigration comes up to retard our development and to humiliate us in the eyes of the world.

Mr. President, I should be ashamed to stand up in my place in the Senate of the United States and to put forth such a pitiful and contemptible plea as that. It has been our policy from the inauguration of the Government to invite immigration; it has been our proud boast that none were turned away from our shores who were worthy and deserving. A distinguished statesman once said that the gates of Castle Garden swung inward, but never outward. I may not quote his exact words, but I do not misquote the meaning of his words.

They were intended to emphasize the fact that conditions in this country were such as not only to invite immigration, but to make it welcome and desirable when it came. They were likewise intended as a pæan of gratulation of the noble policy which had always guided the Republic in this matter of immigration, and now it is proposed to reverse that policy. Why, Mr. President, that policy is almost as well known to the world as our flag, and to see the one has always been to herald the other. That glorious emblem has been an inspiration and a hope to the people of the entire world. It has whispered to them not only an inspiration and a hope, but a promise. To now deny that hope, to now repudiate that promise, would be to dishonor our flag and make it contemptible in the eyes of the world.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I wish to give notice that immediately after the close of the morning business on Tuesday next I shall address some remarks to the Senate in support of the immigration bill.

TICKET BROKERAGE.

Mr. CULLOM. I offer a resolution which I suppose, under the rules, will have to be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I ask that it be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That in considering Senate bill No. 1575, entitled a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," the Committee on Interstate Commerce shall have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to examine witnesses under oath touching the matters which they are hereby empowered to investigate, and may employ a stenographer; and the necessary and proper expenses incurred in the execution of this order shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee.

Mr. CULLOM. If the rule does not absolutely require that the resolution shall go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, it is very important that it should be adopted immediately.

Mr. HALE. I think the rule is imperative.

Mr. CULLOM. I am of that impression myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be referred, under the rule, to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. BUTLER. I introduce a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which I ask to have read at length.

The joint resolution (S. R. 79) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled (two-thirds of both Houses concurring), That in lieu of section 1 of the third article of the Constitution of the United States the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures, shall be valid as a part of the Constitution, namely:

"ARTICLE XVI.

"SECTION 1. The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges of both the Supreme and inferior courts shall be chosen for terms of eight years by the electors qualified to vote for members of the lower House of Congress in the circuits and districts for which any judge shall be chosen. The judges of the Supreme Court shall consist of not less than nine nor more than thirteen judges, as Congress may provide. The judges thereof shall be assigned by act of Congress to circuits in number equal to the number of associate judges, and one judge of the Supreme Court shall be chosen for each of said circuits by the electors therein qualified to vote for members of Congress, and the judges of the circuit, district, or other inferior court shall be chosen by the same electors for the respective circuits, districts, or other jurisdictions in the courts of which the judge shall preside. The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court shall be chosen by the electors in all the States who are qualified to vote for members of Congress in their respective States. The judges first to be chosen under this amendment shall be elected on the Tuesday after the first Thursday in November in the year 1900, A. D., and their terms shall begin on the 1st day of January following, at which time the terms of all other judges of the United States shall cease and determine. Should a vacancy for any cause happen in the judgeships herein provided for, the President shall appoint till the 1st day of January next succeeding the next general election for members of the lower House of Congress, at which general election a judge shall be chosen for the said vacancy for a term of eight years. The judges shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

SEC. 2. Article III of the Constitution of the United States shall be further amended by striking out the words "between citizens of different States" in the second section thereof.

SEC. 3. Paragraph 2, section 2, Article II of the Constitution of the United States shall be amended by striking out all of said paragraph after the word "Consuls."

SEC. 4. Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of these amendments.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that the joint resolution may lie upon the table for the present; and I give notice that at a subsequent day I shall call it up and submit some remarks upon it.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 7, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DEBATE ON THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have the attention of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] a moment. I should like to ask him if he does not think it wise to enter into some arrangement at the present time for closing the debate? I do not know whether it will be practicable to close it to-night or not.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not know but that it may be possible to close the debate at the close of the legislative day on Monday—that is, with the understanding that there is to be a session of the House on Saturday.

Mr. MCCALL. I would like to suggest that there is a special order for Saturday—eulogies on my late colleague, Mr. Wright.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the first two hours of the session on Saturday might be devoted to debate.

Mr. DOCKERY. I wish to say, in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that there are a good many gentlemen on both sides who desire to speak on this subject and who have not yet had an opportunity to be heard. I have protested generally against the extension of the time of speakers in this debate, although it seemed discourteous to object in individual cases. To-morrow is set aside by a special order, and it seems to me that we ought to extend the debate until Tuesday.

Mr. MOODY. Do you not think that with an agreement that the first two hours of the session to-morrow be devoted to debate and that the debate close on Monday night there would be sufficient time? I am informed by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House that the list of those who have notified him that they desired to speak would probably be exhausted by Monday night.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am quite anxious to see the debate close, but a number of gentlemen desire to speak. Then, too, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee [Mr. BROSIUS], has not yet spoken, and of course he will be accorded the privilege of speaking without limit. Several other gentlemen also desire to be heard. We have not had an opportunity on our side to be heard. We have used, all told, as I recollect it, only about thirty-five minutes in this debate. Still I would be quite willing to agree that the debate be closed on Monday evening, only for the special order, which will occupy substantially all of to-morrow.

Mr. MOODY. Of course the session could be extended somewhat later than usual to-day if that should be thought desirable, but in any case I trust we shall have an agreement that the debate close on Monday evening and that the vote be taken Tuesday morning.

Mr. FARIS. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DOCKERY. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that it would be useless for me to make the agreement he proposes, because there are gentlemen around me who say that, in view of the fact that to-morrow is to be occupied by a special order, they will object.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, unless the debate can be extended beyond Monday evening, or even beyond Tuesday, I shall object to any agreement.

Mr. CANNON. I ask the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] while I make a suggestion. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he ask unanimous consent that there be a night session for debate this evening, beginning at 8 o'clock; that two hours to-morrow be devoted to the debate; that on Monday a recess shall be taken from 5 o'clock until 8 o'clock, and an evening session extending until 10 o'clock or 10.30 p. m. for the continuation of the debate; that the bill be then reported from the committee for action in the House, and that the vote be taken on Tuesday immediately after the reading of the Journal. I suggest that the gentleman ask unanimous consent to that arrangement.

Mr. MOODY. I will do so; and in order that the proposition may be pending before the House, I now ask unanimous consent for the arrangement suggested by the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] asks unanimous consent that a recess be taken to-day from 5 o'clock until 8 p. m., and that there be an evening session from 8 until half past 10 o'clock; that the pending subject be debated for two hours to-morrow and on Monday, and that there be an evening session on Monday, beginning at 8 o'clock p. m. and extending until half past 10; that the bill be then reported to the House, and that a vote be taken on it on Tuesday immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, to-night is pension night, is it not?

Mr. MAHON. There are no pension bills on the Calendar.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, if I can not get the floor, I object. In view of the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS] that there should be the fullest opportunity given for debate, in view of the fact that he is now absent, and in view of the further fact that there are thirty names of members on the list who desire to speak, I object.

Mr. CANNON. Then I would suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he give notice to the House now that he will test the sense of the committee at half past 4 o'clock, say on Monday, on reporting the bill to the House. A majority of the House can at any time report it, I apprehend. Or, to be more strictly accurate, that on Monday next, after the reading of the Journal, he will ask the House to make an order limiting and closing all debate on this bill in Committee of the Whole at 5 o'clock on that day.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to make a suggestion, I would ask the gentleman to allow the debate to go on to-day, so as to see how much work we can get through with, and after the session to-day, by which we will be enabled to determine, no doubt, to what extent the debate will run, he can make this order to-morrow. Perhaps we can come to an agreement at that time, which seems now to be impossible.

Mr. CANNON. The notice that the gentleman from Massachusetts serves, if he does serve it, that he will ask this order on the part of the House on Monday next, or on Saturday next, as the case may be, will settle the matter definitely.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, after carefully considering the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois just made, I have concluded to serve such notice on the House.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion before he gives that notice?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Is not this private bill day under the rules of the House?

The SPEAKER. This is Friday.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. And private bill day.

The SPEAKER. Whether it is private bill day or not depends altogether on the action of the House.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Well, it is set apart for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is undoubtedly familiar with the rule. It is set apart, provided the House does not conclude to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of an appropriation bill.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I rose to suggest that if to-day is to be consumed in other matters that the House give us some other day for the consideration of the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MOODY. I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts can end all discussion by calling for the regular order.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I desired to ask unanimous consent that another day be set apart for the consideration of the Private Calendar——

Mr. MOODY. I believe I have the floor, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MOODY. Now, if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] desires to submit a suggestion, I am perfectly willing to hear him.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desired to make the suggestion, before the announcement the gentleman said he intended making that, while I am one of those who have thought this entire debate was wholly useless and have not sympathized with its continuance, yet the House entered upon the discussion with the distinct assurance of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] in charge of the bill that there would be ample time allowed for the discussion——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order. We may as well proceed with the business at once.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have been very much interested and entertained, as the whole House obviously has been, by the two long speeches made against civil-service reform by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. But I do not think they have added much of argument in support of their cause.

Take, for instance, the speech of the gentleman from Indiana. What was the argument presented by him? He brought up for our ridicule the action of a man in the Government Printing Office; and we laughed at his ridicule and sympathized with his indignation as he eloquently depicted the conduct of that official.

But was that a denunciation of civil-service reform? He was simply denouncing the last expiring action of a "spoilsman," who was carrying out the spoils system in opposition to the principles of civil-service reform. Is that, therefore, an argument against the system? It is, in my opinion, the very strongest argument in favor of the system he seemed to oppose.

Twenty years ago if a gentleman had got up in this House and denounced removals from office for the reasons that the gentleman from Indiana gave, and had attempted to be eloquent, as he was, the response would have been a laugh. And why? Because that was the regular conduct, that was the regular inherent necessary practice under the patronage system. Why, sir, if Mr. Tilden had been put into the President's chair in 1877, instead of Mr. Hayes, not only in the Government Printing Office, but in every Department in Washington and throughout this country, the same process would have gone on that the gentleman described so graphically here; and no Republican would have murmured or whined. We would have done the same thing in 1881 if we had got into power. That is the regular routine practice under the patronage system; and the denunciation of it by the gentleman shows that in the last twenty years public opinion, and perhaps unconsciously his own opinion, have changed, and that what formerly we thought was the natural and proper and only method we now look upon as shameful and disgraceful.

Take the speech of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. I admire the gentleman. I think one of the reasons that the antagonism to civil-service reform is so strong in this House is that a man of his popularity, his reputation, his ability and character, has come out boldly and vigorously in opposition to that reform. It is an inspiring and refreshing sight to see our gallant friend as he comes forward and assumes to be the champion of the young men of this country. As he puts himself at the head of this youthful phalanx in the charge on the provision trains and the sutlers' camps and to the supplies and booty of war, I can imagine him bubbling over with boyish enthusiasm, waving a banner inscribed with the motto, "No more graybeards in the public service," and shouting to his young comrades in the words that Macauley has put in the mouth of Henry of Navarre at the battle of Ivry—

> Press where you see my white plume shine
> Amid the ranks of war,
> And be your oriflamme to-day
> The head of Gros-ve-nor.

[Laughter and applause.]

It would be a handsome and attractive oriflamme. It would attract us all; and I think it has attracted many in this House to open adhesion to a cause which before they quietly and silently, if at all, approved.

But what does the gentleman state for his argument? We all know he is a strong partisan. To him the party platform means everything. It disturbs him that he is at variance with our party platforms, and he tries to explain it away.

Now, I agree with his statement that a departure from the subsidiary parts of a platform does not involve party treason. Why, sir, if our platform in the last campaign had denounced civil service, root and branch, I should have supported the platform under all the circumstances, but I should have come in here and voted against that part of it and would not have thought myself guilty of party treason. Nor do I charge it on the gentleman. But when he goes a step further and tries to defend himself by other facts and says that the reason that proposition was in the platform was that when we framed it we did not understand what the order of May 6 meant, he is relying on his invention for his facts. If he would go down and look at the files of the Washington Post or the Washington Star of May 7 he would see stated there the full effect of the order, and in general terms—slightly exaggerated, I think—the number of those to be affected by it.

Mr. QUIGG. Is it not true that the order was not published until months after the date of its issue?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No, it is not true; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. QUIGG. Did the gentleman see that order until months after its date?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I can not say whether I saw it or not. But the gentleman can look at the newspaper files of May and he will find it.

Mr. QUIGG. I undertake to say there is not a man living who saw that order on May 7.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Well, I will not say that the exact terms of the order, if that is what the gentleman means, were published at that time.

Mr. QUIGG. The order was not issued May 7.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. But the effect of the order was known and published throughout the country on May 7.

Mr. QUIGG. Yes, it was known that President Cleveland was going to throw a blanket over the civil service——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. It was known that he was going to issue this order.

Mr. QUIGG. But as for the order having been issued on May 7, I do not believe it; and I never saw any man who saw that order on May 7.

Mr. BROSIUS. Will my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] allow me to answer the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG]?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly,

Mr. BROSIUS. If my friend from New York will look at the Washington Post of Thursday, May 7, 1896, he will see these words in flaming headlines:

By sweeping order President Cleveland extends the scope of civil service. No more spoils of office. Nearly 30,000 places are added to the classified list. Only 775 are now unprotected.

Then follows a long article giving a full and complete statement of the character of the places affected. And a similar article with similar flaming headlines appeared in the Washington Star of the same date; and in all the leading metropolitan papers of the United States were similar headlines with similar explanations.

Mr. QUIGG. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has not answered my question.

Mr. BROSIUS. Then I did not hear it.

Mr. QUIGG. And if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] will endure the interruption——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I will yield to you for a question, certainly.

Mr. QUIGG. I say that the order of May 6 and the significance of that order were not understood for months after the date on which it was pretended to be issued.

Mr. BROSIUS. Now you have changed the issue.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. What was the question the gentleman from New York wished to ask?

Mr. BROSIUS. You have changed the issue. You said it was not published.

Mr. QUIGG. I have shown you that it was not published.

Mr. BROSIUS. But I have shown you that it was published.

Mr. QUIGG. No, you have not shown me anything of the kind. The order of May 6 was a new set of rules from A to Z. The order of May 6 was an abolition of all the rules that had previously existed and the issue of an entirely new set of rules, in which offices were newly classified. Not 30,000, as you have read, but over 40,000 were included in that classification.

Mr. BROSIUS. No, that is a mistake.

Mr. QUIGG. That is the fact.

Mr. BROSIUS. Thirty-one thousand three hundred and seventy-one was the number, and this says 30,000.

Mr. QUIGG. Well, I think that is not correct.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The gentleman from New York sits down without asking any question, as I supposed he would.

Mr. QUIGG. I asked you whether you had seen the order of May 6 on May 6.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. You did not say a word of that in your last interruption, but I am accustomed to that.

Mr. QUIGG. I certainly did not intend to be disrespectful to the gentleman, or unfairly to consume his time.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I know that; but I will leave it to the House whether this statement of my friend from Pennsylvania does not confirm the statement that I made, and whether the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG], that the full order was not published, is not a quibble. The fact is, the country had notice what this order was to be, and that 30,000 men were to be put into the classified service, which was the fact—not 40,000, as the gentleman says. And moreover, the Republican party did not rest there. We went on and adopted our platform, and after we had adopted our platform we took advantage of it and circulars were sent out stating the standing of the Republican party and of the Democratic party on this subject.

These circulars were sent to officeholders, suggesting the advantage that it was to them to support the Republican instead of the Democratic party. I think after that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] can not say that on this ground he is still on the Republican platform.

The gentleman brought up for our admiration the conduct of Tammany Hall in New York. He held up to Republicans as a model the main vital principle of spoils, under which Tammany Hall, the greatest political organization in the country perhaps, the one certainly which we believe has done more to debauch politics and vitiate elections and corrupt the public than any other political organization in the North at least—he holds up their fundamental principles to the commendation of Republicans. I think that is the greatest condemnation of the cause which he himself advocates. And he throws out a threat to us. He says if we do not pass what he wants, then this system will be destroyed, root and branch. Mr. Chairman, I welcome any such issue as that. I should like to see a political party or a Congress of the United States which would dare to attempt to destroy the civil-service system, root and branch. I think gentlemen are misled by what they hear of public opinion. I venture to say that any political party or any Congress which attempted that, which went to the people on that issue, would be so overwhelmingly overthrown that they would never again be in the civil service.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] says the President recommends to us that this law should be modified, and therefore we ought to legislate to modify it. I understand that the President does desire modification. I think every member of this House and of the Republican party desires modification. I do not know of anyone who thinks that this law is perfect. I myself desire various modifications; but inasmuch as the President says it should be modified, and inasmuch as the President to-day has the power to modify it, why not leave to him the modification? It seems to me the gentleman's argument answers itself. It is an Executive function. These offices are all under Executive control. The executive officers are the ones that know where change should be made and where it should not, and I say leave to the Executive the function that he now has.

I do not pretend to say there are not serious abuses under this system. We have abuses which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] spoke of under Logan Carlisle that were shameful. But great men will sometimes have small sons. People will get into offices who ought not to be there; but that itself has led to its own cure, and that abuse has brought about a remedy. In the Departments there are now provisional boards which will prevent any such abuse in the future and regulate promotion. That is the way in a republican government that abuses are cured—by feeling the abuses and then correcting them. We can not correct everything by theory.

There is one abuse spoken of here that is inherent in the system and ought to be cured, and that is, old men accumulate in the service. We can not help it as it is now. There are various remedies proposed. I introduced a bill myself in the last Congress which provided that at 64, I think was the age, every man in the civil service should go out. I think that would be a simple remedy. Every man who went in would have notice of it. I think it would cure the abuse. There are others that have been suggested, and which, perhaps, are better. But because the system is not perfect is no reason why we should do away with it. The system is so far better than any proposed that we must continue it. Gentlemen say, "Why not do as you do in business—select the men you want." They know that that is no argument. They know it is an ideal way, not a practical way.

We know that this is a question between the present system and the old patronage system, and I am surprised that any man who has had intelligent experience of the two systems would say that he prefers the old system to the present system. We have an illustration of the old system right in this House. We are not under civil-service reform. We appoint our own officers. The gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, told us last Congress that there were a third more officials here than were necessary. That is because of the patronage system, we all know. My colleague [Mr. MOODY] showed that their salaries were a third more than elsewhere. That is because of the patronage system.

In regard to the service rendered us I will say nothing, of course, about this Congress. We all have friends here. But I have been in two Congresses before, one Democratic and one Republican. I venture to say that there were men here as our employees in both those Congresses who, if there had been a civil-service system and each man had six months' probation before he received a permanent appointment, never would have been our employees after that six months' test. But why did we continue them? We could not complain to the Doorkeeper. The Doorkeeper does not really appoint his employees. You and I appointed them; and the only way in which he could remove them would be to come to us. The only way the appointment was had was by coming to us.

They were our own appointees, and for that reason there is an illustration right under our eyes of the patronage system as compared with the merit system. We have more employees, we pay them higher salaries; we have poorer service than under the other system. The way our appointees come in here reminds me of a verse I saw the other day in a paper entitled "Success." It said:

It lies through two swing doors swung to.
The attendance is always full.
Some by the door marked "push" get through,
And the rest by the door marked "pull."

Our employees all get in through the door marked "pull." Merit, ability, even push are useless. The only one who is successful is he who has the political "pull." That is the old system; the patronage system as opposed to the merit system.

I want, however, to say just a word on this question as a matter of party policy, as a matter of politics. I do not know whether the gentleman from Ohio or the gentleman from Indiana will condescend to look at it from such a low plane. I agree with them that it ought not to be the controlling one, but inasmuch as I think the old system is not only injurious and expensive to the country, but would surely weaken the Republican party, I am going to venture to allude to this aspect of the matter. I suppose gentlemen on the other side of the House know what is wisest for their party. At any rate, they do not want any advice from us.

I presume their course will win them the kind of votes they are catering for, but I think that if we should adopt their tactics and announce ourselves in favor of the abolition of the civil-service system we would lose the very class of votes we ought to cater for and the very class we can not afford to lose. Gentlemen from Ohio tell us that from 90 to 96 per cent of the people of that State want the civil-service law repealed. I do not pretend to know as much about public opinion in Ohio as they do, but I confess it strikes me as just possible that they may have mistaken the vociferous clamor of office seekers for the great voice of the public. Possibly in Ohio the two are synonymous; but in Massachusetts, where we are not so accustomed to seeing our sons in the Presidential chair, and are not educated up to the Ohio expectation of office, I think the great overwhelming majority of the people are in favor of the present system, look upon it as desirable, economical, and helpful, and want to have it continued and extended.

Mr. BROWN. Has the gentleman noticed the fact that not a single member from Ohio has advocated the absolute repeal of the civil-service law, and that every member from Ohio who has spoken on the subject has spoken in favor of a reasonable modification of the odious features of the law, and nothing further?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have noticed that, but I did not care to allude to it. I think the gentleman himself [Mr. BROWN] called the civil-service law an abomination. I know that General GROSVENOR said he preferred the old system to the present system, and I believe that a great many persons who rise here and say they want the law modified, say they want modification when they would really like to have it repealed. That is certainly what the spirit of their arguments indicates. I believe that what we hear in private conversation on the subject is much more antagonistic to the law than what we hear on the floor of the House, and I really believe there are many members who would like to see the whole law wiped out, root and branch.

But, fortunately, public opinion has influence upon us, and, as I was saying, I believe that in Massachusetts public opinion wants the law retained and extended. I think one reason why they want it is because they believe that the old patronage system allowed a Congressman to build up for himself a personal, selfish machine, made politics mercenary, and allowed the establishment of a boss. In our State we have not any liking for the boss in politics, and I do not believe that any system which paves the way for him will be popular there.

I think the antagonism to civil-service reform is much stronger in this House than in the country at large. That would be natural. We would benefit by the repeal. We are none of us ethereal, above the ordinary motives and influences which actuate human conduct, and consequently we can not help having personal, selfish feelings in favor of a system which would give us great power and patronage, and which will allow us to build up a body of retainers and workers who will help us in the future. Therefore I believe that in this House the feeling of the community or the country is not fairly represented. I am aware that in this House it is unpopular to be known as a civil-service reformer. It seems to me that the epithet civil-service reformer here carries with it very much such a stigma as used in school to be called "a good boy."

I do not think any of us liked that appellation; probably none of us ever had it. But in some such way support of civil-service reform here seems to be taken to indicate a lack of sturdiness and worldliness. It is like accusing a man of taking too much water with his whisky, intimating that he is a little too good, too exempt from the ordinary vices of humanity to be an average Congressman or a good politician. [Laughter.] Now, I think that many of the men who have that feeling overestimate their virtue; that they would really be considered quite wicked enough to be practical even if they were civil-service reformers. [Laughter.] I do not think the people in general believe that because a man is a civil-service reformer he is too good for their service. I think people recognize that work is necessary in politics. I was a worker before I was an officeholder. I think the party workers ought to be recognized. They do a great deal of self-sacrificing, unrewarded, indispensable work. But I want to suggest to gentlemen that there are two kinds of practical work in politics. There is what is usually called "work," and there is also the framing of issues, the establishing of political policies.

That is what we are doing in this House; and I venture to say that the practical effect of the issues that we frame is infinitely more than the practical effect of work at the polls. More depends on the principles that parties put forth and the conduct of parties in Congress and their Administration than on party work. And I believe that any party that tries to overthrow civil-service reform is doing more practical work to hurt itself than all the workers at the polls can undo between now and 1900. [Applause.] I think that our President—our Ohio President—is showing himself not only a broader statesman, but a keener politician than the gentlemen from Ohio who oppose him, and that if we want to not only help the country, but strengthen the Republican party, we should defend and uphold the President as he is upholding and defending the Republican platform.

Mr. KERR. I should like to ask the gentleman a question, simply as a matter of personal curiosity.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. KERR. The gentleman has said that all the gentlemen who are opposed to the present system of civil service are simply seeking to build up a corps of retainers and helpers——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Oh, no; I have not said that.

Mr. KERR. I so understood; and I simply had a personal curiosity to know why it is that the gentlemen of New England have no desire to build up corps of helpers and retainers in political matters.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not pretend to be any more virtuous or unselfish than any other gentleman in this House. I would like to have a corps of personal workers and retainers. I did not accuse—if the gentleman so understood, he misunderstood me, or else in the warmth of speaking I said what I did not mean—I did not accuse men in this House who are espousing the other side on this question of doing it solely from that motive. I simply said that we were subject to that motive; that there was an influence to which we were all necessarily subject and could not escape.

Mr. KERR. Can the gentleman explain why it is that the gentlemen from New England have escaped that influence?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I say we have not escaped it; but I presume one reason operating upon us is that the public opinion of New England is in favor of the civil-service law.

Mr. KERR. Then is it not a matter of political advantage for a New England man to get on the side of public opinion?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly it is.

Mr. KERR. Then that explains the whole matter. [Laughter.] I was wondering about that.

Mr. SULLOWAY. The gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me to say that the views expressed by him do not by any manner of means represent those of that part of New England comprising the State of New Hampshire.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Those of us who live in New England have long known the astuteness of New Hampshire politicians. I will not assume to know more about New Hampshire than the gentleman does. But replying to the remark of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KERR], that "that accounts for it all," I will cheerfully admit that all of us are doubtless influenced by public opinion and that it is very much more difficult for a man who lives in a State where public opinion favors the civil-service system to oppose this cause than in a State where it does not.

I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the men who are espousing this cause on the one side or the other are actuated simply by selfish motives—by a desire to help party workers or by a desire to be in accord with public opinion. We are all of us looking at the question on its merits. But we are all likely to be affected by selfish motives. And I have not yet heard any argument in this House which showed that the patronage system began to compare in its results with the civil-service system.

Mr. KERR. I want to ask the gentleman whether in the charge he has made, that every member who opposes the present system of civil service does so simply because of a political advantage——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I did not say any such thing.

Mr. KERR. Whether the gentleman is not a little uncharitable toward those of us who live farther west, where constituencies are largely against this system, because we seek to represent the opinions of our constituents on this floor.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Why, Mr. Chairman, I thought I practically answered that question in the way the gentleman wished me to do. I have said that I do not impute any selfish motives to anybody; but I do say that there are selfish influences at work, and we have got to look out that we are not influenced by them. Whether any gentleman or any party of gentlemen is so influenced I do not know.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended for five minutes for the purpose of submitting to him an inquiry, if he will be kind enough to answer it.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I am perfectly content to do so, if I can have the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I wonder how much of that time I am to get, and how much my friend from New York will consume? [Laughter.]

Mr. QUIGG. Well, I think we will divide it about half and half.

I want to call the attention of the gentleman and of the committee to the report of the Civil Service Commission for the year ending June 30, 1896, and to read therefrom a short extract on which I desire to predicate my question:

When the President had under consideration a general revision of the civil-service rules during the summer and fall of 1895, and up to late in the spring of 1896, the preparation of the necessary statistics for his guidance presented a serious question when the paucity of statistics along that line was discovered. All attempts to ascertain the number of persons that would probably be included failed to make more than a rough approximation. The positions affected and the organizations included were widely separated, being distributed throughout all the States and Territories, and a few were in foreign countries.

After the President had signed the rules and they had been promulgated and put into operation, it became imperative to know within the closest approximation possible how many positions were affected by that revision, where they were located, the precise nomenclature used, the compensation paid to each of the grades of the employees, and other necessary data, in order that the classification might be complete under the law and the rules. There were no reports extant that contained the necessary information.

Finally this compilation was completed and was printed under a concurrent resolution of the two Houses, which was passed in the House of Representatives on the 22d of December and in the Senate on the 5th day of January following.

Now, I ask the gentleman this question: Did he know any more on May 6 or May 7 than the Civil Service Commission did about the number of places included within this order to which reference is made? [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest that there must be no applause in the galleries.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The gentleman from New York seems to think that a "knock-down" question.

Mr. QUIGG. It is, at all events, an important question in this connection.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I simply know that I read the Washington newspapers and saw no reason to doubt their statement upon this question—that the two Washington newspapers asserted that this order would cover over 30,000 places. I know the Associated Press throughout the country gave the same report. I read the reports and believed them, and it seems to me that that closes the contention.

Mr. QUIGG. Well, it is some 14,000 out of the way; that is all.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts (continuing). And I do not see where the point of the gentleman's question comes in. There were some 40,000 places covered under the order. It really involved only about 30,000, because 10,000 of them were already under the civil-service rules before the order was made.

Mr. QUIGG. We will come to that after a while.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. So, therefore, how the newspapers got the information I neither know nor care; but it was given out throughout the country and I believed it, and I think that every sensible man who read the papers believed it.

Mr. QUIGG. Does the gentleman deny the fact that the order of President Cleveland practically doubled up the civil service by putting in some 44,000 additional employees in the service and then threw the blanket over them for their protection?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am not now, and have not been, advocating anything of the kind. I would like very much to be able to give my opinion on that question if the time permitted me. I have been seeking to present to the committee my advocacy of what I believe to be a proper system.

Mr. QUIGG. But the gentleman has been criticising very severely the views of others. Does he assume that we are opposed to the civil-service principle in its entirety because we are opposed to the unjust administration of certain portions of it?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I referred to gentlemen who declared themselves on the floor of the House as opposed to the present system, and who regarded the old system as good, or better. That statement was made on the floor——

Mr. QUIGG. I am as good a civil-service reformer as the gentleman from Massachusetts is himself, but I am opposed to the manner in which it has been administered. [Applause.] We demand that there shall be corrections in the administration of the law.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not see wherein we differ on that point. I believe myself that there was rightful indignation on the part of the people when during the last two years of the Cleveland Administration, when it was evident that the Administration was going out of power, it took advantage of its occupancy of that high trust and put these positions under the civil-service rules when it was known that we were going into power and would have the right of appointment. I was, perhaps, as indignant as the gentleman himself. But I will not allow myself to oppose the system simply because there have been errors committed under it, or faults committed, nor would I undertake to advocate a repeal of a system that works so advantageously because it took from us certain offices that we thought or had reason to believe were ours.

Mr. SIMPKINS of Massachusetts. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. SIMPKINS of Massachusetts. If I have understood the gentleman correctly, he believes that if authority rested in Mr. Cleveland to commit a wrong, there is the same authority resting in the President now to right that wrong, and that no further law is needed.

Mr. QUIGG. Yes, I know; but he is a long while doing it.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. He has said he is going to do it in part at once.

Mr. BRUMM. Why does he not do it?

Mr. QUIGG. He is a long while in doing it, and we can do it here in five minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. MOODY. The gentleman will find that it is a pretty long five minutes.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Where did the President of the United States get the power?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. He got it under legislation of Congress.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Then why is it out of the province of the legislative branch to enable him to remedy the wrongs that you admit, and that make you indignant?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. It is within our province, of course. We have the right to do it; but the President has the right already, and I believe he will do it without our interfering.

Mr. KERR. Are you in favor of so modifying the law as to put out those men who were kept in under these extensions and put in men who have been examined under the civil-service law?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No; that is just where we differ.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

By unanimous consent, the time of Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts was extended five minutes.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The question which was just then asked me by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KERR] comes right down to the root of this matter. He asks, as I understand him, if I am in favor of modifying the law so far as to take out all those men who were kept in under these extensions. Now, I will say frankly——

Mr. KERR. And to put in men who have been examined under the civil-service law.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Well, I think I understand you. Now, I will say frankly, as I said before, I was provoked at those extensions. I do not know what Mr. Cleveland's motives were. I do not know whether he did it to keep Democrats in or because he liked the system. Provoked as I was, I will only go so far as to say that I will vote to modify the law in those cases which I think ought not to be under the law.

If he extended it over offices which I believe ought to be under the law, even although I believe it was done to take the offices away from us, I will not be so inconsistent with principle as to repeal that law for the sake of giving our men the offices. I will let them stay there, and the only modifications I will agree to are in those cases which I think in principle are wrong. For instance, one case which I have in mind is that of the medical examiners under the pension law. I do not think those places belong under the civil service. I should like to see the law modified and have those places taken out.

I know the collector of my State, in whom I have great confidence, says that his deputies ought to be taken out. I see the President is going to do that, but in spite of my party feeling—my disappointment at not having these spoils distributed—I will not allow myself to go so far as to let that take away from me my self-respect and vote against a principle which I believe in. I will let those men stay there even if I do not think they ought to have been put in.

Mr. KNOWLES. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES. Why do you think these exceptions should be made?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. What exceptions?

Mr. KNOWLES. Those you speak of.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. As to the medical examiners, I do not think a physician whose duty it is to examine a man and see whether he ought to have a pension or not should be under the civil-service rules. I do not think that that is the kind of talent which can best be discovered by an examination. There are not a great many of them, and I think we shall do better by having them appointed as they were before.

Mr. MAHANY. How about the superintendent of public buildings?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I think the same applies to him. My feeling about the matter is this: I think the higher up you go the fewer places should be under the civil service. I would extend it downward. I would put laborers under the civil-service rules and exempt the higher officials.

Mr. MAHANY. That is contrary to the theory of the commission, is it not?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The gentleman seems to think that because I believe in civil-service reform, that I not only approve of everything that Grover Cleveland did in that line, but that I approve of everything which the Civil Service Commission does. Now, there are many things in which I differ from them.

Mr. MAHANY. Where did you get the impression that the President intends to make these modifications?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I got that in the newspapers, the same as I got my information concerning the order of May 7.

Mr. KNOWLES. Oh; it is only the little fellows you would have under the civil service?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not mean simply the little places. I think where you can select just as good men by examination you are taking away the patronage pressure, which, to my mind, is vitiating politics. That is my main reason for thinking that civil-service reform is the better principle.

Mr. BELFORD. What test would you subject a laborer to?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Oh, I can not answer that now. We do it well in Massachusetts.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Of those employees over whom President Cleveland extended the civil-service rules, were not a large majority Republicans?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not know. I do not believe they were.

Mr. OGDEN. Do you believe that all of the 30,000 men over whom President Cleveland extended this order were inefficient?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No; I do not believe that.

Mr. OGDEN. Then what was the ground of your indignation against President Cleveland's extension of this order?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I will agree that it was partisan indignation. It was indignation because we thought that his Administration being discredited and going out, and that we were going to have these offices to fill, they were taken away from us. It was the same kind of indignation that was aroused all over this country when John Adams made his midnight appointments; after he had been legislated out of office he appointed men to various positions, and the whole country roused up against him. I suppose it was some such feeling as that.

Mr. OGDEN. I suppose the same spirit of indignation filled the breast of President Harrison when he made his order of extension.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. We expected that we were going to stay in power. Both sides admitted during the last two years of Mr. Cleveland's Administration that he would not have a Democratic successor, and it is those changes that we most complain of.

Mr. OGDEN. Then, after all, this is partisan indignation and not on the merits alone.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Much of that indignation was. It was, perhaps, not very creditable.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Are you in favor of taking deputy collectors out of the civil service?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I will not say that I am.

Mr. BRUCKER. Were not these first extensions inaugurated under a Republican Administration?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I think that they were.

Mr. KERR. Do you know how many deputy collectors were affected by this order?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not.

Mr. FARIS. Ten hundred and eighty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FARIS. Mr. Chairman, the bill under discussion provides for an appropriation of public money for the support of the Civil Service Commission and system. Because I am unalterably opposed to the present civil-service system of our country, this provision of the bill will not have my support. In the discussion to which we have already listened, and, indeed, during the speech of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, and in the colloquy incident thereto, I saw laid bare more and more the iniquity of this system which we assail.

It has been said that New England was in favor of this system, but judging from the remarks of our stately friend from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY] and the concessions made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, it seems to me there is little difference between them. There is one fact boldly exposed in this debate, and that is that but one member of this body, and he my distinguished colleague from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON], has asserted himself as favoring the perpetuation and further extension of the system of civil service now in force. I regret that my friend is not in his seat.

No man on this floor has a higher regard for my colleague than I, and he knows from our friendly relations of the past decade that I would neither assail nor reflect upon him; but under the circumstances I will be pardoned for making allusion to some of his utterances, not because he heartily entertains them, for in that I respect him, but because I believe that it is simply another case of a good man gone wrong on this subject.

I know the brilliancy of oratory and the ability of my colleague, all of which I admire. And I admire his courage in standing up here and delivering himself as he believes, whether it was in harmony with the constituency he represents or not. We all know it is one of the characteristics of human nature in moments of enthusiasm to be carried away by our flambuoyant oratory of the air-castle-building quality, and if I had been on this floor in 1883 and my colleague had delivered a speech such as he delivered yesterday, I would have regarded it as a masterful presentation of the advocates of the present system.

It is a singular fact, Mr. Chairman, that this question has never before been discussed in the House of Representatives. It is a matter of history with which all are familiar that the present law passed this body with only fifteen minutes given to either side, and much of that time was absorbed in the general confusion on the floor.

I am one of those, Mr. Chairman, who believe that the fathers, with patriotic foresight, invoked and relied upon the general interest of all the people in our politics to maintain and make permanent our free institutions; that this result can only be accomplished through the instrumentality of political parties, and that the party in power, with full responsibility of government, should favor its own adherents and supporters in appointments to office. My colleague, as well as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] who just preceded me, has fallen into the error of discrediting those of us who advocate a modification of this system.

The law would be all right, but there have been scores and scores of Executive orders and commission rules which have been promulgated and published to the world as a part of the system to supply what seemed to be the defects of the law. To that policy of orders and rules, Mr. Chairman, I am unalterably opposed, and I believe the sentiment of this country demands that there shall be a backward step in that regard. I am for the best obtainable public service. No man on this floor would more readily vote to secure the very best interests of the service than I. We simply disagree as to the means to secure it.

I believe, and I am of the opinion, that the people of the country, whether they be Republicans or Democrats, generally regard it the same way—that the present system of administration of the civil service is contrary to the genius of our institutions, that its administration has become odious, and the people will smite the party that attempts to perpetuate it as it is.

Mr. Chairman, let us look at the period just preceding the enactment of this law. We had just come out of the great rebellion; we were in a period of reconstruction and national rehabilitation to adjust ourselves to the new conditions. It was a great period for the speculator and the adventurer, and we see that the seeds then sown by the men who inspired this law bore fruit without the American people understanding just what was coming. The Republican party had been in power since 1860; all the enemies of that great party were in all manner of conspiracy to overthrow it.

Every advantage that could be conjured up by the ingenuity of men was taken to overthrow that party and bring it into disrepute. In that fertile soil for mischief the present civil-service system sprang up and abides to plague and discredit every Administration that has touched it. The great name of Lincoln has been brought into this debate as if to show him in hostility to the method of dispensing Federal patronage in his time. I hold in my hand a book called "Reminiscences of Abraham Lincoln," and have before me the contribution of the Hon. George S. Boutwell, a statesman who held intimate relations to the martyr President. I do not pretend to assert what Mr. Lincoln's views were, but as a contribution to this debate showing the kind of men and their politics that he desired in his Administration, I will read the following extract from the Boutwell paper:

> He struggled first for the Union and then for the overthrow of slavery as the only formidable enemy of the Union. These were his tests of political fellowship, and he carefully excluded from place every man who could not bear them. He accepted the great and most manifest lesson of free government, that every wise and vigorous administration represents the majority party, and that the best days of every free country are those days when a party takes and wields power by a popular verdict and guards itself at every step against the assaults of a scrutinizing opposition. He accepted the essential truths that a free government is a political organization and that the political opinions of those intrusted with its administration as to what the Government should be and do are of more consequence to the country than even their knowledge of orthography and etymology.
> As a consequence he accepted the proposition that every place of Executive discretion or of eminent administrative power should be occupied by the friends of the Government. This, not because the spoils belong to the victors, but for the elevated and sufficient reason that the chief offices of State are instrumentalities and agencies by which the majority carry out their principles, perfect their measures, and render their policy acceptable to the country. And also for the further reason that in case of failure the Administration is without excuse. The entire public policy of Mr. Lincoln was the natural outgrowth of his political principles as a Republican. Through the influence of experience and the exercise of power the politician ripened into the statesman, but the ideas, principles, and purposes of the statesman were the ideas, principles, and purposes of the partisan politician.

Mr. Chairman, we all know that Abraham Lincoln was a politician before he was a statesman, and we all have reason to believe that while he may have seen that the spoils system, so called, had its defects, yet he believed in the integrity of the people and in the permanency of our institutions, and in these rested the assurance for the correction of errors in administration and the purification of party politics.

Mr. Chairman, on the 7th of December last, my colleague [Mr. JOHNSON], in the debate on this subject, used these words:

Every man knows that the spoils system degrades the public man who touches it with his hands. Every man knows that it closes the avenues of public preferment to the intelligent, capable man who can not get the pull of some local politician by giving value received in votes for him in order to be put into the public service, whether he is qualified or not.

Mr. Chairman, that is the familiar cry of the mugwump. That has been familiar in the speeches of that class of our citizens ever since long before the enactment of this law. It presupposes conditions that do not exist and never did. In the debate in 1883 there was very little of such talk in the Senate of the United States. The curse of such mugwump declarations as this was the forerunner of the greater curse of the present system. I say to my distinguished colleague that the day is past when such utterances will deter men, either in public or private life, from the expression of their opinions on this subject or from striking at a monstrosity in Government that limits the hope and makes aimless the aspiration of thousands of our young men in politics.

Mr. Chairman, this is the language of the mugwump, with which we have been familiar. This is the sentiment of the about fifty gentlemen who met two weeks ago in the city of Cincinnati, as they have been doing for years, slapping one another on the back, and interchanging compliments on the fact that for fifteen years they have bulldozed national conventions, have successfully hoodwinked the American Congress, and have hoodooed several Presidents of the United States. [Applause.]

They are the free lances of our politics, whose political abode is "No Man's Land." They support this political party or that, according to the best bargain they can force, and at the same time they are despised by all men of honest political convictions of all parties.

In short, they are the freebooters and pirates of the sea and the charlatans and mountebanks of the land in the political domain of the United States. [Applause.]

Now, on the question of the condition of the public service back in that period, I ask you to look at the debate that took place in the Senate of the United States, as it will throw some interesting light on this subject. Senator HAWLEY took a conspicuous part in that debate, and I read from his utterances. He said:

I affirm that throughout the great branches of the public service in general the work of the Government is well done by men who desire to do it well.

Again he said:

I believe in my country. I believe it is an honest country—as honest as ever lived. I believe it is the strongest, freest, best, and, if I may say it, it has as good a civil service as any other country, or a better one.

Mr. BROSIUS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FARIS. Certainly.

Mr. BROSIUS. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the quotation he has just made from Mr. HAWLEY is from a speech made at the time of the passage of the civil-service law?

Mr. FARIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROSIUS. In that debate?

Mr. FARIS. That is my recollection.

Mr. BROSIUS. Has not my friend read, if he looked over the discussion, these words of Senator HAWLEY which I am about to read? He was a member of the committee who reported the bill, he advocated it in the Senate, and he uttered these words:

I propose to show that we have here a reasonable, simple, practical bill open to no constitutional objection, not in any sense experimental, based upon absolute, conclusive experience, capable of being easily and economically executed, that will vastly improve the whole civil service of the country.

Did my friend see those remarks of Senator HAWLEY?

Mr. FARIS. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania says that Senator HAWLEY used those words, I have no shadow of doubt that such is the fact.

Mr. BRUMM. But does not the language as read show that at that time it was not intended that this law should have such a sweeping scope as has been given to it since?

Mr. BROSIUS. It shows quite the contrary, because the language of Senator HAWLEY expressly stated that the system applied to "the whole civil service of the country."

Mr. FARIS. I will come to that matter a little later on, if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. Chairman, back in 1871, when this general subject was before the Senate of the United States, Senator Morton, of Indiana, gave utterance to language which I propose to quote, and which I am sorry my distinguished colleague, who has the honor to represent the district which was that great man's home, is not here to listen to:

It is said that there are a large number of incompetent and worthless clerks employed. Is that true? I believe the clerks here are as competent and as well qualified and men of as good character as can be found in any country. I believe that our civil service is now conducted as well, if not better than at any former period in our history. We have gone on improving and reforming, and the civil service is getting better from year to year.

Now, what does this language indicate? It indicates that even then the great men of our time saw the improvement that was steadily being made. The language of my distinguished colleague presupposes no progress. If we grant that the service was bad then, what of the strides of the last twenty years? What of our boasted education? What of our improved methods of commerce and our better conditions in mercantile and professional life, all uplifting the character and the quality of our service in private as well as public life?

Why, sir, would not the people demand now of the party in power the highest and best administration of the offices? If we grant that former conditions were bad, have we not made strides of progress that warrant us in the belief that they could not be and continue so now? To assert the contrary is to insult the intelligence and cast odium upon the patriotism of all our people.

Mr. Chairman, the very weakness of this system is made manifest by the concessions of gentlemen who seem to advocate its perpetuity. There has been much said about the scope of this law, and to this also, from extracts in that debate, I will now for a short time address myself.

Senator Pendleton, of Ohio, a Democrat, was in charge of the bill in the Senate, and he used these words:

There has been great misapprehension as to the methods and the scope of the bill. I desire the attention of Senators while I briefly state them. I see I have spoken a good deal longer than I intended. The bill simply applies to the Executive Departments of the Government here in Washington and to those offices throughout the country—post-offices and custom-houses—which employ more than fifty people.

I am told—and I am sure that I am not far out of the way, if I am not exactly accurate—that the number of such offices does not exceed 30, or perhaps 35, and that the number of persons who are employed in them, together with those in the Departments here, will not exceed 10,000. I said that this was a tentative effort, that it was intended to be an experiment; and it is because it is tentative, because it is intended to be an experiment, that the committee thought it advisable in its initial stages to limit it as they have limited it in this bill.

There is another reason which the Senator expressed, and to which I call the respectful attention of the House now. He continued:

There was another reason. The heads of offices and bureaus where the number of employees is small can themselves personally judge of the fitness of persons who are applicants for appointment, knowing as they do more or less in their narrow communities their antecedents, their habits, and their modes of life.

Mr. Chairman, that is what we say now. We have not so much objection to the law as we have to the rules and the orders that have been promulgated and executed following the law. We say that if the law were left to apply as the men who enacted it intended, then there would not be any such scene as we have witnessed in this House in the last few days. From 10,000 positions which it was designed that the law would cover, the commission created by the bill has, by scores of rules and orders of its own making, embraced within the scope of the system they have builded nearly the entire official force of the Government outside of fourth-class postmasters.

On the subject of the scope of this law Senator HAWLEY used these words:

I would not establish a bureaucracy nor in any way bar the honorable political ambition of the young. We do not touch the elective offices of the Government; we do not touch probably over 15 per cent of the appointive offices. The young man is left free to the whole range of offices by election and appointment in his own State.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the law had been allowed to conform to that idea, if it had been confined to the intent and the scope of those who voted upon it, and who understood and debated the situation at the time, then there would not have been any such public indignation throughout the country as we have already witnessed arising from its operation under the bureaucracy that Senator HAWLEY said would not be established.

Senator HOAR said in the course of debate on the scope of the law:

It is merely applicable to clerical and other service in the custom-houses and post-offices and the Departments.

Senator Miller, of New York, on the scope of the law said:

The bill, as we all know, is tentative. It is experimental, and at the beginning we must give the commission large discretionary powers.

Now listen to this language. It was not disputed or questioned during that long and interesting debate:

If it be found at the next meeting of Congress, or at the end of the year or two years, that we have given the commission too much power, that we have not properly circumscribed it in this bill, then it can be amended.

And no man rose to say that that was not the purpose and scope of the bill as it was then understood by its promoters.

Mr. Chairman, we know as a matter of fact that the law has never been touched by legislation in Congress. The only legislation that has been applied to it has been the tinkering and legerdemain of the Civil Service Commission itself, which has brought it into the odium that it now enjoys throughout the country, so that it is a stench in the nostrils of every lover of good government. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the origin of this law I wish to address myself for a moment. There has been nothing of this debate—I refer to the Senate debate of 1883—to speak of brought into the discussion in this House. I therefore beg the indulgence of the committee to read a few extracts which throw, in my opinion, very much light on the subject of the paternity of the law we discuss.

Senator Ingalls, who was then in the Senate of the United States, representing the State of Kansas, had his powers of observation with him, as usual. Here is what he says:

> Mr. President, this bill that is before the Senate is not devised by either of the political parties in the Senate.

My colleague charges, and proclaims to the country, that this was a Republican bill. Here is the record. Further on Mr. Ingalls said:

> It was sent here by a self-constituted commission of exceedingly holy and wise and upright men outside of the Senate and has been practically accepted by a committee of this body. It does not represent the sentiment of either of the political parties in this body.
> I know what I am talking about, sir; and when the Senator from Connecticut assumes the attitude of the apostle of civil-service reform, I say to him that as to this measure he is playing at secondhand.
> This measure was not devised by the Senator from Connecticut, nor was it devised by the Committee on Civil Service Reform of this body. I know who drew up the bill; I know who sent it here, and I know the motives and the incentives that are being used to pass it.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder if any of the ears attached to the heads of the men who met at Cincinnati two weeks ago are burning? Senator Ingalls goes on to say:

> It does not do to assume that this measure is the invention, or that this measure is the device, or that it has been conceived by the Republican party of this body. I know better. I know perfectly well who prepared it; and I know that it has been forced upon the committee and upon the members of this body by influences entirely outside of it.

Immediately following Senator Ingalls, Senator HAWLEY commented upon the measure, and admitted practically and in substance every word and charge uttered by the Kansas Senator as to the authorship of the measure, and as to its being foisted upon the Senate by men and influences entirely outside of that body.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. FARIS. Certainly.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Does he not know that Senator Ingalls was a pronounced disciple and defender of the spoils system, and that he said that purification in politics was an iridescent dream, that votes counted, no matter how obtained, and that that was the one thing that defeated Senator Ingalls when he came up for reelection to the United States Senate in Kansas?

Mr. FARIS. I do not know anything about that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Well, I do.

Mr. FARIS. And for the purposes of this debate I do not care anything about it. I do know that Mr. Ingalls, whether in the Senate or outside of it, usually took care of himself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes of my time to the gentleman from Indiana, and reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FARIS. I am obliged to the gentleman from Wisconsin for his courtesy.

Mr. Chairman, I do not care so much about the details that have been referred to by gentlemen in this debate as to the operation of the civil-service law. My object is to show how this law was regarded by the men who voted for it and to say that the reason of our present hostility toward it is not because of the law itself, but because of the system, the unwarranted and illegal system, that has been allowed to grow up under it. Why, Mr. Chairman, what do we see?

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. FARIS. Yes; if my time may be extended for a time equal to that occupied by the interruption.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has already been extended.

Mr. FARIS. I wish to be understood, Mr. Chairman. I desire to extend every courtesy to members on this floor, but unless my time can be extended I can not yield.

Mr. MAHANY. Why, certainly, it will be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman to decline to yield.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Does the gentleman decline?

Mr. FARIS. I do not decline, if I can have my time extended again.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask that his time be extended five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has just been extended for thirty minutes by a member of the Committee on Appropriations who is entitled to an hour.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Well, I should think that was ample time. Does the gentleman decline to yield?

Mr. FARIS. Yes; I decline to yield, fearing that my time can not be extended longer than I have been granted.

Mr. Chairman, there is another significant question connected with the enactment of this law to which I desire to give a few minutes' attention, and that is the subject of removals from office. I want to show what a few of the leading men participating in that debate in the Senate had to say on that subject. We have seen this law tested in the courts recently and have seen United States court after United States court say that these extensions and these rules and these orders that have been promulgated have been promulgated without any authority of law, but still this pampered commission has proceeded, reaching out and taking in, throughout the length and breadth of this country, every conceivable advantage that could be the product of the acute brain of the mugwump.

On the subject of the power of removal. I wish to read to the committee what certain Senators at that time had to say. Mr. Pendleton said:

> I see it stated that it provides against removals from office. There is nothing like it in the bill. Whether or not it would be advisable to limit removals are questions about which men will differ; but the bill as it is, and as we invoke the judgment of the Senate upon it, contains no provisions either as to tenure of office or removals from office.

Mr. HAWLEY, in several instances in that debate, took the same position, and Mr. Miller, the Senator from New York, took the same position. In the colloquy between Mr. HOAR and Mr. Ingalls, they both agreed to the same effect. So that there was no purpose on the part of the originators of this law—that is, on the part of the Congress of the United States—to have it interfere with the constitutional prerogative of the President of the United States on the question of removals from office.

But what have we seen of the rules and orders that have been built up and promulgated by this self-perpetuating Civil Service Commission?

Mr. Chairman, reference has been made to the extension of the Civil Service Commission under an Executive order, and the application of the system to the pension examining boards. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] who preceded me admitted that that was unwarranted and ought never to have been done. In this admission every fair-minded citizen of the country agrees with him. The destructive pursuits of the late Administration, not content with hounding pensioners with reductions and discontinuances, heaped a parting indignity upon the Union soldiers under the guise of civil-service reform.

Whose ears will ever be quite free from the echo of "Cleveland and Reform"? The country is quite rid of Cleveland, but the curse of his reform still abides. The hostile attitude of his Administration toward the soldiers in their dismissal from the public service, in their defamation and insult in his veto messages, and in their attempted humiliation by his pretense of purging the pension rolls, was fittingly concluded by his last master stroke of placing and leaving the medical examining boards of the country with the stamp of his civil-service reform upon them.

Mr. Chairman, I am authorized by my own judgment and conscience, and as the Representative from a district of more than 50,000 voters, to denounce that act as the most glaring blunder, the most conspicuous outrage and misfit of an Administration famous for its blunders, outrages, and misfits in government. Not alone the injustice of leaving the soldiers for medical examination, for the most part, in the hands of their avowed enemies, but an order requiring our best physicians (and under Republican rule our best physicians were upon these boards), men of that ancient and honorable profession, perhaps with a life of experience, and many of them surgeons in the war, and men whose entry to their professional life was by virtue of a diploma attesting their training and fitness therefor—that such men as these, I say, should have to enter into a competitive examination before some Aleck from the Civil Service Commission, who parts his hair in the middle and does not know the difference between the symptoms of smallpox and the dysentery, is a monstrosity that I fail in language fitly to describe. Mr. Chairman, the people of this Republic are kind and patient and long-suffering. They like fair play and to see fitness in things. The act of placing these boards within the protection of the so-called civil service, which, as now administered, is a fraud and a hypocrisy, was conceived in sin, executed in the dark, so far as the people of the country knowing of it or wishing it was concerned, and was not only without authority of law, but in violation of public sentiment and of opposing decisions by high officials of the Government.

Now, then, what are we going to do about it? The question in my mind is, Has the operation of the system been a success? and I answer emphatically that the sentiment of this House and the sentiment of this Congress and the sentiment of the country cries in thunder tones, "No, it has not been a success." Then I ask the friends of the system this question:

Are you going to join hands with the friends of a just and reasonable merit system when they attempt to reform the present one, or are you going to leave it to be fought over before the people, and have the system entirely wiped out by its enemies? Are you going to unite with those of us who want to see the present system purified, properly limited, and perpetuated on a fair basis of merit, or are you going to take the chance of seeing a system, a real merit system, to which you all claim to be so wedded and which is now within reach, absolutely destroyed? We would not destroy the principle of merit in the service, but we demand a system that ordinary, honest, everyday men will accept as a merit system that possesses merit.

Mr. Chairman, I never held office until I was honored with a seat in the Fifty-fourth Congress. From the time of my majority I have occupied every position in the ranks in working for my party, as private and official, in my county, in campaign after campaign. I know something of the sentiment of the people I represent. There is not a Republican newspaper in my district that is not opposed to a continuation of this system. Some of them want it repealed, others of them want it modified; but they all agree that it is an infamy in our politics and should be radically modified and purified.

On Tuesday of last week there are men in this Chamber who witnessed a remarkable scene in the city of Indianapolis. There was a meeting of leading Republicans from every Congressional district in that State. One of the speakers, in a short address before that body, referred to this system as it has fastened itself upon the politics of the American people. I tell you that it was like the putting of a match to a blast of powder as the pent-up enthusiasm of indorsement of that assemblage of prominent men was given to the utterance against this present humbug.

There is no doubt about the sentiment of the people of that State; and, my friends in this House, you need Indiana if we are to carry the Fifty-sixth Congress for the Republican party. You need Ohio, and you need Illinois, and it will not do for gentlemen who advocate perpetuation of the present system to say that one side of us stand on one extreme and the other side on the other extreme; that we are satisfied with nothing short of the repeal of the law, and you are satisfied with nothing else but the perpetuation of this system.

Let us meet on common ground; let us be reasonable in this business. Let us put our minds to it, and give the people of this country a law that will not only meet the demands of the country's service, but will relieve it from the iniquity that has grown up in it and commend itself to the fair-minded people of the country.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FARIS. I beg your pardon; I can not yield.

Mr. CLAYTON. I just want to read the platform of the Republican convention.

Mr. FARIS. Mr. Chairman, my colleague, Mr. JOHNSON, yesterday in his speech, in his colloquy with my colleague, Mr. LANDIS, reminded the latter that he would appeal to the people of Indiana on this question. I was glad to hear him say that. I shall be more than glad to see him do it. The speech of my distinguished colleague yesterday was largely above us—eloquent, scholarly, but extreme and impractical.

The ordinary position of the mugwump in politics (I do not mean to apply that term to him) is above the heads of ordinary men; but I wish to remind my colleague that if he appeals to the people of Indiana next year on this subject, he will do it in a campaign that will be conducted on the ground. He will come down and walk on the earth with the people to whom he will appeal. There will be nothing of the campaign in the air unless some of us are there after the votes are counted. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, in the Departments at Washington we would see perpetuated the merit system. We would see men get into office with fitness as well as capacity; but outside of Washington and outside of the great cities of the country, and outside of the Railway Mail Service, I would leave all the Federal offices absolutely at the disposal of the Administration in power. That is what a Senator of the United States said in effect in the debate on the present law, and that is what they intended.

I say to our Democratic friends that when they go before the people and win at the polls, their Administration in its appointments to office should reflect the political sentiments and policy of that party. And, on the other hand, when we trounce them before the people, I would have throughout the country, except these places which I have mentioned, their political friends promptly walk the plank and my friends put in their places. [Laughter.] No other plan will prove practicable, feasible, and satisfactory to the people who rule this country so long as human nature remains as it is.

Mr. Chairman, this is the only hope of the party organization, this is the only way to perpetuate the views our fathers had for the adhesion of party politics. It is the only hope of great achievements by political parties in this Republic, for when one party is in power the best interests of the nation are subserved when the other great party is outside watching it.

Another thing. Unless this system is curtailed and limited my friend from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] referred to the inevitable result—that only rich men can come to occupy seats in Congress. What can we do to encourage the men who did us the honor to send us here? Aye, I am sorry my distinguished colleague [Mr. JOHNSON] has not yet come in, for if this is true there are two districts in Indiana, the old burnt district so honored by his representing it in this body (except on the civil-service question) and my own, that would have to send two other men here to represent them.

My view is, and I believe it is supported by public opinion through all of the States, that the present law, with its unwarranted and odious extensions by and through the rules and orders of its commission, is a failure; and if I were to attempt to discuss the details of its practices, such as have been referred to in this debate, I could not do it with complacency. If I had my way about it, I would gather together enough of the public indignation felt by our people to fill the cavernous maw of the Civil Service Commission and utterly sink it into oblivion. But that might not be the best way. I am willing to compromise and make concessions, but I do proclaim that its examinations have become the laughing stock of the nation and its practices well-nigh a crying evil.

Why, we have heard it said that the question of capability is everything. I was told a few weeks ago that there was a certification of three names at a given place for appointment by the appointing power. One of the names was found to be that of a drunkard, another that of an ex-convict, and the third that of a cripple unable to perform the duties of the position. If this be true, it is only a further instance of the iniquity of a system that would or could permit it. Capability up, fitness down!

Why, Mr. Chairman, there was a merchant in my part of the country who in a legal proceeding was selected to take an inventory of a great stock of merchandise. He, with his companions in the appraisement, came to the item of 4 gross of socks, and he took his pen and wrote the word down "sox." [Laughter.] A friend called his attention to it, and he said, "Oh, yes; there is something wrong there; I see it," and he took his pen again and wrote it "soxes." [Laughter.]

Now, there was a man who, by his industry and brains, had accumulated a fortune in the mercantile world, but if he had been called upon to pass a civil-service examination conjured up by this commission, with the whole city of Chicago as a prize, he would not have got a brickbat. [Laughter.] Fitness not considered even along with capability! This thought occurs to me: Our friend Robert G. Ingersoll would be abundantly able to pass an examination according to the rules of this commission for the position of preacher in my church, but if an orthodox adherent were to look into his record, I dare say it would hardly be regarded as a fit one for a Methodist preacher. [Laughter.]

Capacity up, fitness down, has been the tendency of this infamous system which we assail. My colleague [Mr. JOHNSON] said that we were resorting to threats. No, gentlemen, there is no threat about it; there is only an earnest and friendly admonition. He said he would appeal to the people, and he said that the President of the United States should stand firmly where the mugwumps want him to stand, and should appeal to the people for support in his attitude on this question.

Let me give you what I regard as a result of appealing to the people on this issue. Suppose that next year in the Congressional campaign in Indiana we should appeal to the people from the standpoint of my colleague's speech of yesterday——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to ask the gentleman a question, if it will not interrupt him.

Mr. FARIS. It is only a matter of time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I will help you to get additional time.

Mr. FARIS. All right. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You talk about threats. Is it not true that the threat part of the business is on the other side; that it is these civil service reform propagandists who are always threatening the fellows who do not believe with them—threatening them that they will not be reelected? Is not that the way it runs?

Mr. FARIS. Of course it is. They are the people in this country who have always been the holier than thou fellows. They are the ones who go sailing and soaring above the heads of the ordinary people, and who are never content unless the ordinary people accept their dicta.

Of course my distinguished friend from Missouri hits the nail on the head by asking the proper question which he submits. But, sir, my distinguished colleague (not yet in his seat) said he would "appeal to the people of Indiana" on this question. Now, we shall soon have a political campaign in Indiana for the election of members of Congress. Suppose we "appeal to the people" for the maintenance and continuation of this present system. The ordinary political parties, with their systems of work, are to be disregarded.

This business is above political parties. It only appeals to them when it suits their purposes to do so, and it carries itself above the heads of all. Why, think of it a moment! These men in Cincinnati two weeks ago resolving with adulation to the President of the United States, as if their words would encourage him to execute their wishes! Would they not have done the same thing if a President of another political faith had been in the White House and shown a dipsosition to favor their views? Certainly. They care not for political parties. Political parties, Administrations, Presidents, all are the legitimate prey of the purist, the theorist, the mugwump reformer.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BURTON). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MAHANY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended ten minutes.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. I will not object if the gentleman will consent to let me read the civil-service plank of the Republican platform.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended; and then if the gentleman from Indiana wants the gentleman from Kansas to read that plank, let it be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, in the first instance, Shall the gentleman's time be extended for ten minutes?

Mr. FARIS. Let me hear the request of the gentleman from Kansas.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the question be first taken on the extension of time. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FARIS. Now I will hear the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON].

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. The gentleman said that the Republican party was not responsible for this law, and he quoted Senator Ingalls and others to show that it was not. Now, I want to read the civil-service plank of the Republican platform adopted at St. Louis by the national convention of that party:

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM.

The civil-service law was placed on the statute book by the Republican party, which has always sustained it; and we renew our repeated declaration that it shall be thoroughly and honestly enforced and extended wherever practicable.

Let me read a word or two further in that connection. After the convention had adopted these various planks, the platform continues:

Such are the principles and policies of the Republican party. By these principles we will abide; and these policies we will put into execution.

Mr. FARIS. Mr. Chairman, I was addressing myself to the suggestion of my colleague that "we appeal to the people of Indiana" on this proposition. We have a campaign for Congress there this year. What shall we do to create an interest among our young men active in the political ranks? We can not do anything in the ordinary processes of party politics.

What shall we do about polling our precincts? "Oh, we will pay no attention to that; we are going to appeal to the people on this question." What shall we do about rallying our forces and getting them to the polls? "Oh, we will taboo that practice; we will do nothing of that kind; we stand on this pure, exalted pinnacle, appealing to the people as the advocates of the great civil-service reform as we are practicing it in our country."

My fellow-citizens—because you are my fellow-citizens—I will tell you what would be the result. The people would cast their ballots; and the candidate for Congress who would "appeal to the people," as my colleague recommended yesterday that the President should "appeal to the people," and ask to be taken into their broad arms and close to their hearts, would, when the ballots were counted, find himself much in the condition of the boy who approached his father with a bleeding face and a battered nose, and the old gentleman said, "Why, my son, what is the matter? Have you been fighting?" The boy replied, "Well, pa, there was a fight; but I wasn't in it." [Laughter.]

But, to conclude, we are called, in this debate, the "spoilsmen." We are charged with wanting to bribe our constituents in order to get their support. It seems to me that on reflection such a charge would come pretty close home to the man making it, if he would analyze and examine the meaning of such utterances as we have heard them. Mr. Chairman, I believe in my party as I believe in our people. Its achievements will shine in history and gather added luster with the march of time.

I believe that the prosperity of the people and the glory of the nation depend upon the continued ascendency of this party, the enforcement of its policies, and the perpetuation of its principles. If I am to be denominated as a spoilsman because I arraign at the bar of the American people a system whose certain result is the overthrow of my political party, then I accept the appellation. [Applause.]

If I am a spoilsman because I want the iniquitous thing known as the civil service, as now applied, radically reformed, so that the Federal offices in the various States of the Union shall be open to the friends of the party which triumphed at the hands of the people, then I cheerfully accept the appellation, and will wear it as an acceptable decoration. If I am a spoilsman because of advocating an honest merit system, which, with my party in power, will place my political friends in the Federal offices in Indiana, instead of my political opponents and enemies, then I am a spoilsman, and confidently appeal to the intelligence of the patriotic people of that great State to judge me by that standard. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DALZELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

H. R. 5173. An act authorizing the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to purchase subsistence stores, supplies, and materials for the relief of people who are in the Yukon River country, to provide means for their transportation and distribution, and making an appropriation therefor; and

H. Res. 106. Joint resolution extending limit of cost of the Government building or buildings at the Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition at Omaha, Nebr., and reducing cost of Government exhibit.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MCRAE was recognized, and yielded a part of his time to Mr. CUMMINGS.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, one of the greatest United States Senators that ever came from New York was Roscoe Conkling. [Applause.] Roscoe Conkling once spoke of the "dreary drivel about snivel service reform." I never appreciated his characterization so much as in the last two days. This discussion seems to be giving it the finishing touch.

I have been an opponent of the civil-service system upon this floor for over ten years. In that time, in every Congress, a resolution providing for its repeal has been sent to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and that committee never, in the whole period of its history, has had the courtesy and courage to accord to the opponents of the measure even a hearing. The committee, composed of friends of the measure, simply sat on it. And it is only to-day, I foresee with great satisfaction, that you are liable to get something out of the committee, even if it is only a mouse.

In the Fiftieth Congress, when the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill was up for consideration, I moved to strike out the appropriation for the Civil Service Commission. That motion was opposed by Mr. Randall and by Mr. Cox; but upon a poll of the House we found that we had 57 members in support of it. It was the only way in which we could get a hearing on the floor. It was the only way in which we could reach the civil-service humbug. If we could not reach its heart, we thought we might lop off a hand or even a big toe. We might starve it to death if we could not kill it outright. [Laughter.]

In the Fifty-first Congress a similar resolution came from the other side of the House. That magnificent statesman from the mountains of Tennessee, Leonidas C. Houk, made the motion. It was debated here for hours, and then a vote was taken. Over 70 votes were cast in its favor. From that time to the present the tide has been steadily running in the same direction, until to-day it has reached such proportions that the roaring of the surf upon the shore of public opinion can be plainly heard. The system is doomed, and one of the factors in its doom is Tammany Hall. [Applause.]

We have heard a great deal about what the people will do with men here who oppose civil-service reform when they go before their constituents for reelection. Well, what have the people done? Let us examine for a moment. Tammany Hall, in the late municipal election, nominated a candidate for mayor upon a platform that was distinctly anti-civil-service reform, a platform that held that the public good required that municipalities should be ruled by political parties, and that the party in power should be held responsible. The New York Democracy nominated a man distinctly pledged to this principle.

What was the result? On that platform they carried the second greatest city in the world by an immense plurality. [Applause.] It was the voice of the people, spoken in thundering tones. The pledges are being carried out. Removals are being made by scores, and honest working Democrats alone are being placed on guard, filled with a sense of their responsibility to their party and to the people. I predict, Mr. Chairman, that this same Democracy will carry the State of New York next fall by even a greater majority on the same platform. [Applause.] They are responsible to their party and their party is responsible to the people for their action, and not to the Civil Service Commission.

I was surprised to hear our good friend GROSVENOR from Ohio, who has just returned from that hotbed of corruption, Columbus, [laughter]—and who has hied himself back there very promptly—I was surprised to hear him characterize Tammany Hall in the course of his remarks yesterday as "corrupt." It came with good grace from the State which profited by the shameless robbery of the Presidency in 1876. [Laughter and applause.] It came with exquisite grace from the lips of a man who was a friend and supporter of R. B. Hayes, John Sherman, and Eliza Pinkston in days long gone by. With such remembrances back of him he ought to be the last man to characterize Tammany Hall as corrupt. [Laughter.]

But I was more surprised when I heard my friend from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] say that "it was the most corrupt political organization upon the face of the earth." When I heard these words they recalled a speech made by Chester A. Arthur, then Vice-President of the United States, at a New England dinner in New York after the presidential election in 1880. He spoke feelingly concerning the result which had been attained by the use of "soap" in Indiana. [Laughter and applause.] It was a great thing for Indiana. She needed soap, and she used it, if you will remember, in "blocks of five." [Laughter.] Tammany Hall corrupt! Where was she ever accused of corruption like this, and when did she ever publicly revel in such corruption?

But I was still more surprised when I heard the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] get up to-day and reiterate the statement with civil-service embellishments. Sir, the Tammany Society is a patriotic, liberty-loving society, devoted to the interests of the nation. It has existed one hundred and nine years and has celebrated one hundred and eight Fourths of July. It sent its sons to the border in the war of 1812 to fight the British invaders, while men in Massachusetts were holding the Hartford convention. [Laughter and applause.]

The Tammany Society at the outbreak of the war for the Union organized, equipped, and sent to the front the Forty-second Regiment New York Volunteers, and no regiment in that war carries flags with more names of battles emblazoned upon them than the flags of the Tammany regiment. [Applause.] Tammany Hall corrupt, eh! I appeal to the record and challenge the assertion. The very reform administration that has just been repudiated by the people of New York spent $200,000, granted by the courtesy of a Republican legislature, in investigating the accounts of the Tammany administrations, and what was the result? After weeks and months of sustained and persistent effort they got rid of the $200,000 and found a deficit of 2 cents in the register's office.

These are facts, Mr. Chairman. Their accuracy can not be challenged. Then there was the Lexow investigation committee. It was sent to New York by a Republican legislature to create a storm, throw up sand, and fill the eyes of the people with dust. It was under cover of their efforts that the reform administration crept into power. Need I speak of some of the features which led to this result? The movement had its inception in the visit of a New England clergyman to a bagnio, where he drank beer and played leapfrog with the inmates. Nay, more—he not only acknowledged it, but actually gloried in it. Has Tammany Hall ever descended to such depths of depravity as this? [Applause.] If so, she has never had the shame to acknowledge it and glory in it. [Laughter.]

Well, this Lexow committee began its inquiries. The Democratic member of the committee was repeatedly bulldozed, and lo! the first corruptionist unearthed was a Republican police commissioner. He resigned in disgrace. The evidence was too strong for him. And as the testimony was taken a number of police captains were accused of corruption. Most of them were Republicans. Some were tried and convicted, but I will do them the justice to say that nearly every one of them has been rehabilitated by the action of the court of appeals. No, sir; after over $100,000 spent by the Lexow committee and $200,000 spent by the commissioners on accounts in investigating Tammany Hall they were compelled to give her a clean bill of health. She stands to-day, after a century of existence, as pure as any political organization, civil service or no civil service, in the United States.

Mr. Chairman, New York City seems to be a favorite mark for gentlemen upon the floor of this House; and I will not except the Democratic side of the House, for she frequently gets a blow from it. I appeal on her behalf for fair and just consideration. This city, with over 3,000,000 inhabitants, is to-day a satrapy of the State. She was paying tribute to the Republican end of the State. She was paying 54 per cent of the State taxes on only one-fourth representation in the legislature before the consolidation. Since the annexation of Brooklyn and outlying towns and cities she probably pays sixty-odd per cent of the State taxes, with only one-third representation in the legislature.

This representation can not be changed in years, because of a State constitution framed by our moral friends on the other side. That State constitution expressly provides that no matter how great the population of New York and Brooklyn may ever become, they shall not have more than one-half of the members of the legislature. So that, carried to a legitimate deduction, if the great city of New York had 10,000,000 inhabitants to-day and the counties outside had only 100,000, the 100,000 would elect one-half of the members of the legislature, and, with the aid of the vote of a Republican lieutenant-governor, they would be in a position to impose taxes upon the 10,000,000 inhabitants of the city for the benefit of the 100,000 living in the rural districts. We must judge of the future by the past.

In 1890, under an unjust apportionment and a violation of the State constitution by a Republican legislature, the city of New York paid 49 per cent of the State taxes on a one-fifth representation in the legislature. In addition to this, she paid all of the expenses of the education of her own school children, and was then taxed a proportionate amount to pay for the education of the school children in the rest of the State.

But this was not all. New York City paid all the expenses for the keeping of her own insane, and was taxed a due proportion to pay for the keeping of the insane of the rest of the State. Nor was this all. New York City paid all of the expenses of her own State militia, paid for erecting her own armories, and was taxed to pay for the armories and the expenses of the militia in the rest of the State in proportion.

Now, sir, what was the result of such taxation by a Republican legislature? I will tell you. The county of St. Lawrence, the leading Republican county in the State, under the guise of a school fund, took out of the State treasury $27,000 more per year than she put into it. The county of Delaware, another Republican county, took out of the State treasury every year $16,000 more than she put into it. The county of Tioga, the home of my distinguished friend THOMAS C. PLATT, took out of the State treasury $1,500 a year more than she put into it.

So that the great Democratic city of New York was forced under this unjust legislation to pay tribute to the rural Republican districts. To-day, under the apportionment of the new constitution, one Republican in a country town has the political power of three mechanics—or three bankers, if you like—living in the city of New York.

Corruption! What do you call this—corruption or robbery? The corruption is on the other side, Mr. Chairman; a corruption unparalleled in the history of this country, unless you except the State of Connecticut. [Laughter.] A corruption which levies taxes upon Democrats for the benefit of Republicans! A corruption which exists to-day and a corruption which will exist until the people of the State of New York follow the example set by the citizens of the great city of New York—shake off their shackles, repeal the civil-service law, hold parties responsible for legislation, and open a road to prosperity and equality that has been closed ever since the war. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

I yield back to the gentleman from Arkansas the time that he has so kindly allowed me.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HEPBURN having taken the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its secretaries, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 1081. An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to quitclaim and release unto Francis Hall and Juriah Hall and their heirs and assigns all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the east 20 feet front by the full depth of 100 feet of lot 2, in square 493, in the city of Washington, D. C., as laid down on the original plan or plat of said city;

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MCRAE. I yield so much of my time to the gentleman from New York as he may desire.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to heartily indorse all that my colleague from New York has said. I should not consider myself a worthy representative of the Democracy of Kings County were I not to rise to my feet and lift up my voice in indignation against what the Demosthenes of Ohio, General GROSVENOR, the Cicero of Indiana, Mr. JOHNSON, and the Webster of Massachusetts—I do not know the gentleman's name [laughter], but the Webster of Massachusetts—said when they alluded to Tammany Hall as being corrupt. Time and again this assertion has been made, and time and again the action, the policy, and the legislation of this great political society have been indorsed by the people at the polls and by tremendous majorities her candidates have been intrusted anew with the reins of government of that noble city.

With lower taxes, with the greatest improvements of any administration, with the most honest and economical expenditure of every 100 cents of the taxpayer's dollar, the city of New York and the people who reside in it have been far better governed under Tammany Hall than they ever were under Republicanism.

My friend [Mr. CUMMINGS] has told you that the Republican party, under Mayor Strong, deemed it advisable in their wisdom to endeavor to prove to the waiting Republicans of the United States that Tammany Hall was corrupt, and after squandering $200,000 and over of the people's money for this purpose their Republican expert accountants reported, as my friend has said, that there was but 2 cents difference on the books, and he has it wrong, I think; for instead of it being 2 cents against Tammany Hall it was 2 cents in favor of Tammany Hall. [Laughter.]

The Tammany Society is older than this Government, and it would indeed be passing strange if in about one hundred and nine years of its existence there have not been one or more men who have erred and done wrong.

Has the Grand Old Party (G. O. P.), so called, never been corrupt? Has it never had dishonest men in it? Have they never done anything to be ashamed of? Why, gentlemen, the most colossal theft that has ever been known in ancient or modern times was perpetrated on the American people in 1876—namely, the theft of a President.

When the gentlemen from Ohio, Indiana, and Massachusetts introduced the subject of "Tammany Hall" in this House they made this a national matter; and I tell you now, you representatives of 70,000,000 people, that when Tammany Hall hears characterizations of Republican corruption, dishonesty, and wrongdoing in distant localities, it simply draws the curtain of American manliness, sincerity, and sense of justice over what they consider to be very little of their business. Ah! gentlemen, if you want to know what the real cause of the trouble about Tammany is, I will tell you.

"Tammany Hall" to be perfect in the eyes of Republicans should be Republican Hall. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. STEELE. Right you are. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. DRIGGS. Whenever you mention the word Tammany to a Republican you will notice a perceptible change comes over the color of his eyes.

You can see they immediately assume a hue of green and their souls become possessed of monstrous jealousy and envy that they have never developed the capacity to create and keep up such an organization, such a political engine of equal strength, magnificence, and harmony.

Do the Republicans know what they are saying when they characterize Tammany Hall in this manner? Do they know that some of the greatest patriots and statesmen of the country have been members of the Society of Tammany?

Mr. HEPBURN. Croker. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DRIGGS. Do they know that Silas Wright, a magnificent statesman; Governor William L. Marcy, formerly Secretary of State; Hon. John A. Dix, Secretary of the Treasury and governor of the Empire State, and Samuel J. Tilden, Governor John T. Hoffman, and Andrew Jackson, Martin Van Buren, Lorenzo B. Shepard, and many others equally as illustrious were members of the organization now slandered by the gentlemen from Ohio, Indiana, and Massachusetts?

Tammany does not come here to this House of Representatives—before you, freemen of the United States—to defend the government of any foreign nation. We are Americans. We are Tammany men, if you please; but at the same time we believe in America, we believe in her institutions, and, if necessary, we believe in the repeal of this civil-service law.

Tammany Hall and its founders took part in the formation of this Government. Her founders fought in the war of the Revolution; her sons fought in the Mexican war; her grandsons fought and died under the Stars and Stripes at the time of the rebellion, and her great-grandsons, in 1871, at the time of the terrible fire in the city of Chicago, were the first to offer aid and assistance to their suffering brothers of that place. About the same time, when the South was worried and troubled, not knowing when mother, father, or brother, or son would be stricken down with yellow fever, it was the sachems of Tammany Hall that gave their money and said, "We will send medicine and assistance to our brothers of the South."

To-day her great-great-grandsons stand ready awaiting the call from any community that may be suffering from calamity. From Maine to California, from Florida to the Pacific Coast, they stand ready at all times to assist their fellow-countrymen. And if the grim monster of war should take us in its throes, you would find that these Tammanyites, these American men, these American voters—aye, these American politicians, if you will—would be standing shoulder to shoulder, marching to the front, as they have done before, in the defense of their country, of your country, of their flag, of your flag. [Applause.]

I object to the characterization on the other side that Tammany Hall is corrupt, and I propose to continue objecting just so long as gentlemen indulge in that characterization. Tammany Hall is to be respected. Tammany Hall is American, it is not English, and I say once and for all that as far as I know Tammany will always remain true to American institutions, true to this Government of the people, for the people, and by the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I heartily agree with what an American statesman once said on a great occasion of Tammany Hall: "I love the tiger of Tammany Hall because its claws are always reeking with Republican blood." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I heard a new theory advanced in civil-service reform to-day by one of my colleagues from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT]. Toward the latter part of his remarks he said he was in favor of those principles of civil service which would result in having examinations for the laboring man and allowing all the classes above the laboring class to be employed in the Government service without any examination. I stand upon the floor of this House to-day and say that I am not in favor of that principle of civil-service reform which would require any examination of the laboring man. The laboring man has too many burdens already.

My colleague, in his remarks, also stated that it was the opinion of the collector of internal revenue for the eastern district of Massachusetts, whose intimate friend my colleague is, that the deputy collectors should be taken from the civil service, and I asked my colleague whether he was in sympathy with his friend in that regard. He said that he could not answer that question at the present. Now, Mr. Chairman, a few weeks ago in the debate on this same question I had occasion to refer to the silence of my colleague from Massachusetts when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] made his attack upon the principles of the civil service. In the revision of my remarks I may have placed, and I did place, in the RECORD a little more than I said upon the floor, but if I did not give utterance to the sentiments I printed, I intended to do it, but was prevented by the limited time at my disposal.

The leaders of the discussion in favor of the retention of the civil-service law come from my State. I said at the time I refer to that I thought there was some hypocrisy in the position of some of the members from Massachusetts upon this question. I hold in my hand a letter which I read upon the floor of this House, showing that in Marblehead, in Massachusetts, when a competitive examination was held for the position of letter carrier, a Democrat, although he received the highest percentage, was not appointed, and that two other Democrats have been certified by the Civil Service Commission to the authorities here in Washington, but that neither of them had been appointed. Now, Mr. Chairman, some one is responsible for the nonappointment of those Democrats, and I think that the gentleman who is responsible for their nonappointment is here at the present time upon this floor advocating the principles of civil-service reform. [Laughter.]

He appears to be in favor of the principles of civil service, but against their enforcement [laughter], particularly when their enforcement would result in the appointment of Democrats to office.

Mr. Chairman, we had some short time ago a municipal campaign in the city of Boston and a Democrat was elected. For two or three weeks previous to that election Republican orators were upon every platform and in every hall throughout the length and breadth of the city charging the Democratic party with being the party of the spoils system and holding up the Republican party as the embodiment of purity in politics and of civil-service reform.

Mayor Quincy, who was Assistant Secretary of State, was charged with being the chief exponent of the "spoils system" in Washington—with having removed more consuls than any man who had ever previously been honored with the position of Assistant Secretary of State. Those statements were uttered broadcast upon every platform. I say here now that under the present Administration more removals have been made in the consular service than were made under the administration of Mr. Quincy; and I challenge denial of that statement from any of my Massachusetts Republican colleagues.

I hold in my hand a letter which I received from a gentleman in Quincy who took the civil-service examination, who was appointed to a place in that service and was discharged by a Republican postmaster before he knew of his appointment; and upon an appeal being made to the Democratic Administration here in Washington, some three years and a half ago, that appeal was sustained and he was restored to the place.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is only fair to show by these letters which I have quoted here on the floor of the House that a great many men from Massachusetts, while seeking in their public statements to make you and me believe that they favor the principles of civil service, are just as anxious to place Republicans in office as any Democrat on the floor of this House is to place Democrats in office; and when it comes to putting their friends forward for public offices, they do not care for civil service or anything else if they can accomplish their purpose.

That, Mr. Chairman, was shown to me very clearly during the last Congress. It was my duty as the only Democrat from that section of the country to go to the Senate almost daily and advocate the confirmation of men who were nominated by the President of the United States for positions as postmasters. I was met on every hand with charges that were trumped up by various men from various parts of the State.

If any opportunity offered itself to prevent the confirmation of the President's appointees, thus keeping Republican postmasters in power, it was accepted.

The men who had been nominated were compelled to come to Washington and appear before the Post-Office Committee, and, after disproving the charges that were made against them, their confirmation was still prevented by a policy of nonaction by the Senate. This was particularly the case in Brockton and Amesbury, where honest and competent men had been appointed and were refused confirmation simply because they were Democrats.

Mr. McRAE. I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] is now recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, it would be exceedingly inconsiderate for me to strike a discordant note in the midst of this chorus of praise for Tammany Hall. I will not do so. I will only say that the men of this or any country and the events of this or any country are like monuments, good or bad, which can not be affected by our praise or blame. If for government and public service Tammany Hall is the ideal of any gentleman or of any party, let it remain so, with Boss Tweed as a central figure, and with all others who have been a part of that organization.

But as some reference has been made to several gentlemen from my own State, perhaps a word of defense is necessary. The name of John Sherman has been mentioned. I do not stand here as his defender; he has enough defenders without me. But I do say that he has been a mighty factor in four of the greatest events of this or any other country. His early career was given to resisting the aggressions of slavery; a later era to the restoration of the Union; his middle life to the abolition of slavery; his riper years to the rehabilitation of the finances of this country. Of an honored name, more than 70 years of age, even if the future have nothing in store for him, he has a past which is secure and will be written as with a pen of iron among the great and good deeds of this and other lands.

I want to say, too, in behalf of that much-abused man who has gone to his rest, Rutherford B. Hayes, that he was a man of clear head and strong brain—a man whose title to his great office was as good as that of any one who has ever occupied the Presidential chair. Placed there by a commission provided for in a bill passed by Democratic votes—by votes counted when a Democratic Speaker was in that chair—his Administration, in all that pertained to a good administration, will remain a splendid chapter in the history of this country. [Applause.] There was the solution of the Southern question in the only way in which it could sensibly be settled. There was a pure administration of public affairs. There was some advance in this much-abused civil-service reform. There was a marked improvement in the business conditions of this country.

And now, passing from the two men from my State who have been assailed, I come to the question before us. I can not agree with those who have preceded me in their attacks upon the system of civil-service reform as at present administered.

For one I am willing to vote for a bill forbidding any Representative on this floor from making any recommendation for any position in any of the Executive Departments of the Government. [Applause.] And I would do it, sir, not because I thought it would take away a privilege, but because it would relieve us of a burden that at times is too grievous to be borne. Every member here must choose between efficient service as a Representative of the people and the giving of so large a share of his time to solicitation for offices as to render his work inefficient and unsatisfactory.

But whatever may be our opinions upon this question, I wish to say that the merit system has come, and has come to stay. [Applause.] The efficiency of the public service in the various departments of the Government argues for it. The growing demand for it in the great cities in the land proves that in the opinion of the people its inauguration and enforcement will give a better administration of municipal affairs.

I appeal, therefore, to the members on this floor to turn aside from denunciation of the system, and to confine their arguments to reasonable criticism, so that necessary modifications may be made in the manner in which the law is to be administered. [Applause.]

I would not overlook the hypocrisy of some of the advocates of the system, or ignore the palpable dishonesty of some who have had to do with its enforcement. I believe in changes—changes in detail and administration rather than in principle, presumably by Executive order rather than by Congress.

In order that what I may say may not be in the line of vague generalities, I will endeavor to make specific recommendations.

Let it be provided, first, that confidential subordinates, private secretaries and deputies, particularly those for whom the superior officer is liable upon his bond, shall be excluded from the classified service.

The object of this modification would not be to increase the number of places to be distributed, but to secure greater harmony and greater efficiency in the public service. [Applause.]

The recommendations made by Secretary Gage a few days ago include many of the cases in which exemption from the classified service would be beneficial.

And here, by way of digression, while not assuming to defend the Secretary, I can not help thinking that he has been unjustly censured for his order regarding superannuated clerks in his Department. We must consider, in dealing with a question of this kind, the conditions that confront an official at the head of a Department. What were these conditions? There was a system in vogue under which men were retained on the rolls at full pay while unable to perform the duties of their positions because of age or inefficiency. He sought to establish the rule that those who for a long time had been in the public service and who were unable to do efficient work should receive half pay instead of full pay as theretofore. Confessedly unable to do away with this crying evil, the presence of so great an amount of deadwood, he did what he could to diminish expense and raise the standard of effectiveness.

Second. Let there be an examination of those covered into the service by Executive order without examination, many of whom were appointed as a reward for political services with only incidental regard to fitness. It matters not whether there be but a small number or tens of thousands. Let there be even-handed justice between those who are in office and those who are out, and let the same rule apply to all. Let not those who entered the public service without examination masquerade under the guise of reform, and in effect say, "We advocate competitive examination as an essential prerequisite for holding office; but we will stay here and continue to hold our offices, although we never have been examined and never expect to be."

Such a change would have for its object, not the multiplying of available positions, but the establishment of just rules in making selections, and the securing of men of better qualifications.

Third. A better system of making promotions. The heads of Departments and bureaus have, in many instances, given over this whole matter to their subordinates. There has been established in some cases what is called a board of promotion, which, as I verily believe, has been governed largely by favoritism. If the merit system is a good one, and men are admitted in the first instance by competitive examination, why not promote them by competitive examinations also, or by an efficiency record carefully and justly kept, so that "each second will stand heir to the first," and our system may be harmonious and congruous throughout?

Fourth. Make our examinations more practical, and, where an examination is not a feasible test, omit it entirely. This is but a detail, however, of administration. Not long ago my attention was called to the examination of an applicant for a position as a plumber. There was a great deal about grammar and geography and other subjects, but not one word about plumbing or any other trade. Now, let us make these examinations practical for the particular trade, or else confess that we can not make selections by examination.

Another suggestion: Where a position is to be filled for which there is no eligible list, do not incur the tedious delay of framing examination questions, giving notice, and providing for an examination, and thus postponing a selection until the time has come when the work ought to be finished. I know of an instance in which a draftsman was needed in an engineer's office, and the whole work had to be postponed, though plenty of competent men were at hand.

But I wish to reiterate what I said. All these things suggested here are not to make room for those who seek office, but to give greater perfection to the public service and make the rules a shield which shall protect those who are efficient rather than those who are inefficient.

I now wish to pass to some errors—you may call them delusions—of those who oppose the merit system and argue for its abandonment and the adoption of the spoils system.

First. They say a man in public life can appoint his friends; he can reward the workers. Never was there a greater delusion. Who is to determine who the workers are? Who knows who they are? Does the President know, or do the heads of the Departments know?

Can a Representative here who has a friend in the humble walks of life who has done him great service, but for whom he is told there is no position in the Government service—can he find a place for him? Can he run the gantlet and pass by the other influences which must be consulted and be sure that he shall secure positions for those whom he would wish to appoint? Is it not the common experience of every one of you that those whose claims are advocated most strenuously are those whom you can not recognize as having rendered the most valuable assistance?

And what is more, how are you going to provide for the whole number? Under the old system there were at least twenty applicants for every available position, and as you multiply the number of available places the number of applicants increases in even greater proportion.

There are 178,000 in the Government service. How many workers were there in 1896? A myriad uprose and supported President McKinley and the Republican party. Not moved by the sound of cannon, not roused by the beat of the drum, the mighty procession marched in silence and with that resolution which comes from fixed conviction, holding aloft the American flag, the honor of which they vowed should not be sullied. When it came to election day a multitude of freemen went to the polls, in comparison with which the hosts of Xerxes were but as a gathering of home guards. Seven million one hundred and five thousand voters cast their ballots for McKinley. Come, ye dispensers of patronage, how are you going to provide places for all these workers? More than half of them, probably, would be benefited if they were to be transferred from their usual avocations into the Government service, both in purse and in assurance of earning a living.

If you are to provide for the workers, you must provide for those who fought the fight for principle as well as for those who entered into the contest because they expected to get an office as the reward for what they did. We must provide for those in the homes of the lowly, upon whose welfare the true prosperity of every country must rest; for the man who is modest, who is self-depreciating, and not alone for those who are obtrusive, and who, in season and out of season, are thrusting their claims to the front.

Another claim is that it builds up a political party. There never was a worse fallacy. It destroys a party. Every practical politician recognizes that after a successful campaign the open opposition or lukewarmness of the disappointed ones is an element of danger.

Either there must be a very small amount of patronage as now and formerly in the Government service, five loaves and two small fishes for a great multitude, or, on the other hand, there must be, as there is in some of our States and municipalities where appointive positions are very numerous, a ring.

What are the usual characteristics of a ring? It is an organization for the domination of a city or a State, an organization that is always talking about the party and political principles, and always thinking about the fleshpots of office. It is an organization that in the daylight is marching in political processions, professing to advocate its party and its interest, and at midnight is entering into secret cabals with the other side to promote the common interest of the two; an organization which is not for the improvement of the country or the upbuilding of any party, but an organization that is for self all the time, and nothing more, ready, if self-interest dictates, to destroy the party which gave it place.

And just as the people of this country, in their love of freedom, have resisted tyrants, so also will they, though dominated for a time perhaps, in some portions, rise up in their might and crush a ring. Neither this country nor any part of it is to be ruled in that way. It is to be ruled on the theory that each individual is equal before the law, and does not need the intervention of a ring to govern him or anyone else to speak or think for him.

They say if the merit system is abolished there will be rotation in office. There is another delusion. Do the men who are appointed under the so-called spoils system believe in rotation in office? Competent or incompetent, they believe in staying in until they are carried out, sometimes forming a cluster of leeches on the body politic, swaying with serene incapacity the offices which they obtained by favoritism, the duties of which are performed by others who obtained them by merit, but who must remain in subordinate positions.

What is the origin of the idea that rotation in office is a good thing? It is the impression that public offices are a private snap; that the incumbents have large pay and little work; that the most meager qualifications are sufficient. This impression is well caricatured in a work of French fiction. There was a lady who wanted to provide for a steward of hers. She was perplexed for a time, but finally said:

> I first thought of making M. Taverneau manager of one of my estates; * * * but he is stupid * * * and, alas! what a manager he would make! He would eat the hay instead of selling it. So I had to relinquish that idea, and as he is unfit for anything else I will get him an office. The Government alone possesses the art of utilizing fools.

[Laughter.]

If there are offices which require so low a grade of ability, they ought to be abolished.

Then as to this idea of limiting the tenure of Government office to five or six years. Why, gentlemen, is there a law in any of your States that says a lawyer shall only practice law six years; that a surgeon after practicing surgery for five years must turn to something else; that an artisan must take up half a dozen different trades in his lifetime? This Government of ours is entitled to the services of its citizens who are best qualified, and those who are best qualified are entitled to the offices and to the assurance that, if they do faithful work, they may give their best efforts to the Government.

To another thing I feel like calling the attention of the committee, one of the unseemly features of the spoils system, and that is the exposure of men in public office to persistent importunity for political influence, for it is well recognized that that is the best way to obtain positions.

We have laws for the protection of children, we have laws for the protection of animals, and yet it seems sometimes that we need laws to prevent public men from the importunities of office seekers more than any one of these. We have an example in the case of President Garfield. A man hounded him for an office, who, if he had called on any business man and displayed the same disgusting personality, would have been thrown out of the window. He was the most despicable and repulsive specimen of anatomy ever molded into human shape; and yet because he could not get an office he felt justified in taking a pistol and shooting the President of the United States; not because the President was unkind, not because he differed from him in political policy, not because he was not a great man, but because he would not give a miserable deadbeat an office.

Something of this persistent importunity is now exhibited at the White House.

Some months ago I went up there with a friend who is somewhat of a cosmopolitan and who is accustomed to speaking more frankly than I should approve of those who are in positions of dignity. He wished to be presented to the President of the United States. There was a great throng there. After waiting a considerable time he bluntly said: "Oh, come along; we can not wait here. People will think we are part of this mob of Senators and Representatives hunting places for their constituents."

I must say there was some good ground for his remark, for the White House was crowded with those who were seeking places to the absolute exclusion of all other public business.

In the minds of many the whole framework of government was made for the creation and dispensing of offices. When there is a bill brought in for the creation of an office, the question is not whether it will benefit in the administration of public business, but is there some friend or favorite who can fill the position and gracefully draw the salary?

What we all wish is the best government possible and the best management of public offices. What rule is better or fairer than that which says that, irrespective of politics or religion, the men and women of this country by the criterion of intelligence and merit shall fill the executive offices of the Government which are not political in their nature?

The competitive system, defective as it may be in some respects, is the best and fairest available. In its enforcement great advancement has been made. Let us take no backward step. This Government does not exist for the purpose of rewarding favorites. It was not created for the purpose of rewarding party workers, grateful though we may be for their services and impracticable as we have found it to reward any considerable portion.

It is said that on the tomb of Sulla in the Campus Martius there was an inscription, written by himself, which read: "I am Sulla the Fortunate, who never failed to reward a friend or punish an enemy." Boast worthy of a modern spoilsman! His influence, great and versatile as he was, was notably ephemeral in its character. Modern statesmanship has a higher ideal. It is to build up a great nation; to furnish the justest and most efficient government for all American citizens, Republican, Democrat, and Populist alike, and by ever improving methods to increase the prosperity of this people and the honor and glory of this Republic.

[Applause.]

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to my colleague, Mr. VANDIVER.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, I had thought to content myself with a few remarks bearing directly on the paragraph of the bill under consideration, the appropriation of money for the support of the Civil Service Commission. But since this debate has taken such a wide range that it reminds me of the preacher's sermon, which was so far from the text that if one had had the smallpox the other would not have caught it, I think, perhaps, it may not be improper to indulge in a few more general observations.

Mr. Chairman, may I inquire what it is that causes all of this conflict and commotion? Why are we, 360 of us at this end of the Capitol (and 90 more at the other end), with all our adjuncts and aids for legislation, spending days, or perhaps weeks, of time and thousands or hundreds of thousands of dollars in talk—talk about civil-service reform? Is it because the great body of the American people, honest, industrious, and self-supporting citizens of the Republic, fear that their property is endangered, their liberties imperiled, their lives menaced, or their happiness in any way involved? Is it because some great danger threatens to overwhelm us? Or is it because some commercial enterprise waits on our action, or some great moral and educational reform is to be worked out? No, no; it is none of these.

It is a question so insignificant, a question so utterly foreign to the welfare of the great mass of our people, that it would seem unfitted to engage the attention of any but peanut politicians and partisans. It is simply this: There are a few petty little Government clerkships held by Democrats, and a great horde of hungry Republicans want them. The Republican platform and the President's message declare in favor of the civil-service law and further extension in its application. The Republican party has claimed to be the champion of the merit system as against the spoils system, and yet here stand the leaders of the Republican party denouncing the civil-service law and inveighing against the Administration because it is not turning out Democrats fast enough to suit them.

Here stands the veteran leader from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who, I regret, is not in his seat just now, ready, I suppose, to demonstrate with statistics that 45,000 or more Democratic heads should fall off to-morrow morning, and as many Republicans take their places. Very well; go ahead; do it. You have the power; your party is organized and in control of the Government. There are about one-seventeenth of 1 per cent of the people of the United States who are holding places that you want for your political henchmen. Now, what we ask of you is not to stay your hand, but proceed at once, repeal the law, and fill all these places with your political followers. Then stop all this cant about "civil-service reform" and "merit system;" be honest and candid about it: say you do it for political reasons; feed the hungry horde of office seekers who are hounding your footsteps by day and disturbing your dreams by night; but do not ask us to assist you in so modifying the law, either by enactment here or by pressure upon the Executive, as to enable you to turn out these 45,000 Democrats from office and yet leave the law to stand as a cloak with which to cover your sins.

True, this would be ignoring another plank in your platform, but you have already shattered much more important planks in it than this one. If we may take your Secretary of the Treasury as your accredited spokesman, you have already abandoned your campaign pretenses of favoring bimetallism, which your party was pledged to promote. If the President's message is to be taken as the expression of your party's position, then you have shattered the Cuban plank in your platform and made it easy for the gentleman from Ohio to parry a thrust of the gentleman from Massachusetts, who had charged him with getting off the civil-service plank, by simply asking him in reply, What has become of the Cuban plank? But what a spectacle does this afford! What an argument for a distinguished statesman to make!

In substance, it reads like this: We have broken faith with the friends of Cuba, therefore there is no longer any reason why we should keep faith with the friends of civil-service reform. In short, it is a confession which should bring a blush of shame to the cheek of honest manhood, a confession that the Republican platform of 1896 was made to catch votes, and is not expected to bind the action of party leaders after they get into office; the platform of last year to be abandoned simply to meet the exigencies of party patronage this year. And why? To improve the public service? Or reduce the expense of the Government? No; but for the avowed purpose of keeping the Republican party in power—a consummation devoutly to be deplored. And the distinguished Republican Representative from North Carolina, Mr. LINNEY, went so far as to say, in substance at least, that in his State the pressure was so strong that if the present civil-service rules were not abolished and his party followers given some reward for their party fealty there would not be enough Republicans left after the next election to give a decent burial to their defeated candidates.

Mr. Chairman, has it come to this? That the Republicans in North Carolina and Ohio (for I presume they are as good in one State as in the other) are Republicans for revenue only? Are they Republicans only so long as the hope of patronage can inspire them? As a partisan, I might take some comfort from the gentleman's prophecy, because I know you can not satisfy more than one in a thousand, and the other nine hundred and ninety-nine will be left out in the cold to do their kicking. But as an American citizen with some pride in the patriotism and intelligence of my countrymen, I can but contemplate it with a blush of shame. Think of it! The ranks of a great political party made up of men whose allegiance depends upon getting an office—a forty-dollar clerkship perchance! And it is quite apparent, too, that this scramble for office, this horde of place seekers, is not confined to North Carolina and Ohio.

The howl comes up from Pennsylvania and Missouri, from New York and California, from Michigan and Georgia. Old Mr. Chauncey I. Filley, the veteran war horse of the Republican party in Missouri, openly charges his party leaders with running a political broker's shop and selling appointments to office to the highest bidder, and even bartering away judgeships on the Supreme Bench of the United States in consideration of large contributions made to the Republican campaign fund. He tells us further that if his party is not purged of commercial politics, syndicate control, trust combinations, and Hannaisms in general its days are numbered.

We frankly admit our sympathy for this heroic old character, the most picturesque in the annals of Missouri Republicanism, now in his declining years mourning over the sins, the follies, and the prospective fall of that party to which he has devoted the best years of his life. And for this attempt to purify his party Mr. Filley is ostracized by those who have been his associate leaders and by his party press. If they succeed in unhorsing this old veteran, then the Democrats of Missouri may at least congratulate themselves on getting rid of the only political foe that has ever been able to even give us a scare in our State since the days of reconstruction.

But what a spectacle does all this present! What a sight for gods and men! Are there no principles left for Republican statesmen to defend? Is the whole Republican party organized only for the spoils of office? Has the great party of Lincoln and Grant descended to the business of running a huckster shop? If so, then let us hear no more of patriotism, and no more of eulogy for the old soldier, and no more appeals to the great names which adorn the annals of your history. Turn over the whole business of clerkships to your brokerage department and quit calling yourselves "the party of great moral ideas." Repeal the civil-service law in toto; fill every place in the Government service with your party followers, and after 1900 we will have the privilege of turning all the rascals out and appointing good, honest Democrats to carry on the business of this country—Bryan Free Silver Democrats at that. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

But, understand me, I do not mean you to infer that I am essentially a spoilsman. I do not appear as the champion of the spoils system. I believe in the principle of a merit system which would remove purely clerical positions from the domain of politics, with limited periods of appointment; but I am utterly opposed to a life-tenure system, or to any system that tends to build up and maintain a governing class, an office-holding aristocracy. I do not believe that any man ought to be appointed or elected to any office in the world for life.

Let every man feel that his tenure of office depends upon the approval of his fellow-citizens, and you will thereby secure the most efficient service and keep constantly before the minds of public servants their responsibility to the people from whom they derive their authority. You will then put before every aspiring youth in the land the encouraging opportunity for promotion. Active talent, instead of birth and blood or influence in political circles, will become the test of political preferment, and our sons with ambitious pride will honestly strive for those prizes of position and power which are open to the competition of only free and unfettered manhood.

Mr. Chairman, allow me to refer again to the growth of this Civil Service Commission, for the more I hear and learn of it the less use I have for it. We have been informed here, I suppose on good authority (Mr. PEARSON), that the expense of this Civil Service Commission at its origin, in 1883, was but $6,800 per year, and now it asks for $98,000. We are also informed by the same authority that in 1883 the Bureau of Engraving and Printing had only 11 persons drawing $1,200 salaries, and now there are 84 persons drawing that much, while in the Office of Supervising Architect there were only 8 employees drawing salaries of $1,200 or more, and now there are 90 such persons. Also, that in the Fifth Auditor's Office there were in 1883 only 23 persons drawing salaries of $1,200 or more, and now there are 46. In the Patent Office there were 215 and now there are 311; and in the Land Office there were 210 and there are now 253 persons drawing these salaries. And so it goes in other Departments; all of which seems to indicate that the more we pay for civil-service reform the more expensive does Government service become. [Applause.]

Mr. PEARSON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him—not to disturb the line of his argument, but to correct a misstatement of my own?

Mr. VANDIVER. Certainly.

Mr. PEARSON. In the Coast and Geodetic Survey I made an error, unintentionally, in the figures that I have given. I am informed by the Superintendent of that bureau that there has been a change both in the field and office force; in fact, a total rearrangement since 1883, and that the reduction in the one more than counterbalances the increase in the other. While this is an error in one particular—which I make haste to correct—the general truth of that statement as to the whole civil service is admitted by the strongest advocates of the system. So my figures in that particular were not correct.

I thank the gentleman for the privilege of allowing me to correct this.

Mr. VANDIVER. And I thank the gentleman from North Carolina for calling my attention to the matter; but he will find on investigation of my remarks that I have made no reference to the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

And so, Mr. Chairman, in the other Departments of the Government we find the same rule prevailing, all of which seems to indicate that the more we pay for civil-service reform the more expensive the Government service becomes. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to a few very important and very significant facts connected with the expenditures of the Government. It is admitted by all parties that the appropriation bills which have passed this House have carried some items of extravagance and some that were not at all necessary for the public good. I have no disposition to charge our political opponents on the other side of the Chamber with all the extravagance that the Government has ever been guilty of, for we all know that even under favorable conditions, and when all honestly desire prudence and economy in public expenditures, it is very difficult to keep from allowing some unnecessary items to creep into the various appropriation bills; and it may possibly be true that even a Democratic House has at some time or other given way too easily to the reckless spirit of extravagance on the part of those who are always ready for an inroad upon the Treasury.

But it must be admitted by the gentlemen on the opposite side that the great increase in the Government's expense account has been mostly under Republican Administrations. And the late so-called Democratic Administration is to be commended in one respect at least, and that is its effort to economize in public expenditures. And among all the sins that have been charged to the account of Grover Cleveland, "his fat-witted excellency," the late occupant of the White House, he should at least be credited with some effort to stay the hand of the Treasury raiders. This "lone fisherman of the White House," although a traitor to his party, which made him all that he was and twice elected him to the highest office in the gift of his countrymen, an ingrate and an outcast, seemed to have at least some lucid moments in which he discovered the constant tendency not only of men, but of whole communities to depend upon the Government for support, and the ever-increasing demand for more money to satisfy the greed of hungry office seekers. I mention this to his credit, on the principle that we should give the devil his dues.

And now I challenge the attention of the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber to this proposition: That the public expenditures have always increased whenever a Republican Administration has come into power, and whenever a majority of the members of the House have been Democrats there has been a persistent and successful effort made to lessen the burdens of taxation and economize in public expenses, as we would do in the management of private affairs. In proof of this proposition let me cite you to the fact that public expenditures constantly increased after the war, under Republican Administrations, until the total appropriations of the Forty-third Congress, in 1876, reached the sum of $328,128,199.32.

The Forty-fourth Congress was the first Congress after the war which was Democratic, and immediately, in 1877, the total appropriations were cut down to $299,591,138.07; which means that the first Democratic House that was elected saved the people of this country $28,537,061.25. The next Republican Congress was that of 1883, of the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, and the total appropriations made at that session were $422,137,073.31. That same Congress, at its second session, in 1884, made total appropriations amounting to $354,297,875.23. Then the tide again turned, and the Forty-eighth Congress was Democratic. Immediately the total appropriations fell to $318,829,489.13; or, in other words, this second Democratic Congress reduced the expenses of the Government $35,468,386.10. It is but fair to state that the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses, both being Democratic, increased the appropriations somewhat.

But the Fifty-first Congress was again Republican, and the total appropriations of this Congress amounted to $525,018,672.59. The Fifty-second Congress was again Democratic, and reduced the appropriations to $507,600,188.75. This enormous amount was made necessary, it must be remembered, by the new pension law, which had been passed by the previous Congress and greatly augmented the expense account of the Government. But in spite of this it will be seen that the appropriations were reduced again and a Democratic House had saved $17,418,483.84. But in 1897 the Fifty-fourth Congress reached the high-water mark of Republican extravagance when it passed appropriation bills amounting to $530,083,030.10.

I assert, then, without fear of contradiction and on the authority of actual facts and figures, that whenever a Democratic House has been elected by the people it has lessened their burdens, and whenever a Republican House has been elected it has proceeded at once to increase the appropriations and heap burdens of taxation upon the people.

These figures are from official sources and clearly prove the difference in the management of financial affairs of the Government by the two great political parties. And if we would leave out of account what is known as permanent appropriations—that is, amounts appropriated for payment on public debt and other standing contracts of the Government—and take into account only the annual appropriations for purposes entirely under the control of each separate Congress, the difference is even more striking, as may be shown, for instance, by the striking contrast between the figures of the Forty-seventh Congress, which was Republican, and the Forty-eighth, which was Democratic.

The total general appropriations, exclusive of payment on the public debt, made by the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress amounted to $297,311,602.29; and the appropriations for the same purposes made by the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress, Democratic, amounted to $195,710,508.09, showing the wide difference of $101,601,094.20. And if we compare the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress with the second session of the Forty-eighth Congress, for these general purposes, the difference is $12,398,364.45. And, averaging the two sessions together, the annual saving on these general-expense accounts during the two years of the Forty-eighth Congress was $56,999,689.33. Or, in other words, the Democrats of the Forty-eighth Congress saved to the taxpayers of the country in two years the total sum of $113,999,378.65.

While the Republicans of the Forty-seventh Congress had increased the appropriations for these purposes over the Democratic appropriations of the Forty-sixth Congress by the enormous sum of $264,652,624.96; and then when they came into control again in the Fifty-first Congress, commonly called the "Reed Congress," they increased the appropriations for these purposes $126,563,401.12. And lastly the Fifty-fourth Congress (Republican) increased the appropriations for these purposes during the two years of its incumbency by $31,705,275.30.

What may be the total appropriations of the Fifty-fifth or present Congress it is too early yet to forecast. But the exigencies of party management or the indignation of the taxpayers of the country must at last have produced some effect to tighten the purse strings; or, possibly, the anticipated deficiencies in the revenue from the Dingley tariff law and the consequent necessity for more bond sales, which would be political suicide for the Administration, may have given the old party of extravagance a spell of the cramps. Or perhaps it may be more charitable to suppose that the present disposition of the Republican House to make some show of retrenchment and economy is to be attributed to a proper and patriotic consideration for the welfare of the tax-ridden people; and if so, I sincerely congratulate our friends, the enemy, on having at last learned some of the rudimentary principles of democratic government; some of those principles of economy which have come down to us from Jefferson and Jackson.

Let them now go a step further in their progress, if they are sincere in their desire to promote the common interest of American citizens, and put into practice that fundamental principle of democratic government, that people should be taxed only enough to meet the expenses of Government, economically administered. But I fear that we are indulging a vain hope if we ever expect the Republican party to become the champion of any of the principles of economical administration in Government affairs. In fact, they would have to turn over a new leaf, face about, and abandon all of their previous customs. I have no desire to heap reproach upon the whole organization of the Republican party. I am not so narrow as to suppose that no good thing can come out of Nazareth; but if I were called upon to sum up in the fewest words what seems to me to be the controlling policy of the Republican party of to-day, I think the figures which I have given and the facts referred to, as well as many other facts of current history, especially relating to the present Administration, would warrant me in saying that their whole scheme embraces three distinct but coordinate parts of an immense combination for the control of the destiny of this country: First, by levying high taxes upon the great body of the people to collect an immense revenue into the coffers of the Government; secondly, to so adjust those taxes as to use the mighty arm of the Government in forcing the great bulk of our citizens to contribute to the building up of great fortunes for the favored few who happen to be their pets and political supporters; and thirdly, by the use of this immense Government revenue collected to make such extraordinary appropriations and fill so many Government offices as to satisfy the greed of a horde of hungry Government contractors, political henchmen, and public cormorants, the driftwood of modern civilization.

Mr. Chairman, whatever party may be responsible, it is worthy the notice of all intelligent citizens that the expense of administering the Government has in time of peace, yea, even in time of great financial distress, not only increased in total amount of money expended, but increased more rapidly than our population has increased. Those who know something of the management of great business affairs, and even of the most elementary principles of political economy, assure us that a large business establishment which can put into operation the principles of division of labor can be managed more economically than a small concern in the rudimentary stages of development. In other words, by all the rules of business and all the principles of political economy, we ought to expect that a great country, doing a great business and applying the strictest rules of economic science, could manage its affairs with less expense to the average individual citizen than a small community or a nation in the earlier stages of civilization.

But in spite of this general principle we are confronted with the fact that ten years ago the per capita cost of Government for the people of this country was $5.47 a year, which would seem in itself extravagant enough, but now the average has climbed up to $6.24 per capita, or an increase of 77 cents per head. This may seem to be an insignificant matter, but when we consider that the amount ten years ago was extravagant, and while our people have passed through a great financial crisis, so that their expenses on the average have fallen while the Government expenses have risen, and are still rising, we must consider that this is a subject worth the attention of patriotic statesmen.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me ask, in conclusion, What is it that the Republican party stands for to-day? The old party which once stood for the abolition of human slavery and the union of the American Commonwealths; the party which even eighteen months ago professed to have some great principles to defend; the party which in its last campaign professed to stand up for the cause of bimetallism in America—what has she to stand for to-day? When you gentlemen on the opposite side of this Chamber were candidates for your present positions, standing on the Republican platform of '96, you proclaimed again your adherence to the time-honored principles of self-government and pledged yourselves, if you were elected to office and your President were put into control of the administration of affairs in this country, that you would lend a helping hand to those distressed and downtrodden patriots of a neighboring island who were struggling for the same principle for which our forefathers fought—the right to govern themselves.

Aye, at that time you were profuse in your professions of sympathy for the suffering patriots of Cuba; and many in your party went so far as to denounce in terms of bitterness and reproach the dilatory and diplomatic tactics of the late Mugwump Administration of Mr. Cleveland. But now what do you stand for? Your Administration has been in power for more than three-fourths of a year, and that same dilatory, cold-blooded, and heartless policy of procrastination is still pursued. And when we have, on this side of the Chamber, time after time, proposed means of relief, some expression of sympathy, some official declaration of the belligerent rights of these courageous patriots, you have sat in your seats as silent and dumb as oysters; as cold as marble. Your President has even made a strong plea for the Spanish persecutors, and is still standing, hands off, while the cruel and barbarous war proceeds—a war which in cruelty and barbarity has had no parallel since the time of the Inquisition.

Since your Administration came into power, it is estimated that a half million of these unfortunate subjects of tyrannical authority, right under our noses, and almost in sight of our shores, have suffered the pangs of hunger and endured the hardships of uncivilized warfare. I can not believe that the President of the United States is himself personally indifferent to the sufferings of distressed humanity. I can not believe that his heartless policy of delay and diplomacy is the proper exponent of his own feelings, for he is credited with being a gentleman of humane and generous instincts. But the power which controls him, the commercial interests, which from the very inception of his candidacy to the present hour seems to have dictated his policy, apparently even yet has its mighty grasp upon his Administration, and true to the past record of your party, the bondholders, sugar planters, land grabbers, and stock speculators must be given time to unload and save themselves before this great Government, which calls itself the embodiment of Christian civilization, can raise its hand to stay the tide of war and bloodshed.

By the act of appropriating money to relieve distressed and suffering citizens in Cuba we have declared that a state of war exists there. And by the recent indorsement of the President and Secretary of State of the scheme of raising a relief fund by private subscription the Administration still admits the existence of a state of war, and yet we are held back from such a declaration of that fact as would aid those struggling inhabitants of an unhappy island to secure their independence and put an end to th horrible scenes of war. I am inclined to think that this contribution itself would merely serve to prolong the agony and help to relieve the Spanish Government from the charge of starving innocent women and children.

Furthermore, does it not seem that the true spirit of humanity, the sense of justice, the sentiment of human freedom, has departed from the counsels of your party? Aye, you have been so long engaged in balancing accounts, in levying taxes and disbursing revenue, that you have come to the point where you have but one unit by which to calculate all quantities, one standard by which to measure the merit of all theories, one touchstone by which to try the character of all opinions and test the purity of all sentiments. You have but one measure for all things—the almighty dollar. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, one word and I have done. You come and ask us to modify the civil-service law. You remind me of the two Irishmen who came over to this country and went coon hunting. The dog treed, and Mike climbed up the tree. He said, "Now, Pat, you stand down below." Pat said, "All right. You shake the coon out, and when he strikes the ground I will kill him with a club." Mike climbed up the tree, but instead of being a coon it turned out to be a wildcat. They grappled. Pat, down below, heard the struggle up in the leaves of the tree and called out, "Mike, shall I come up and help you to catch him?" "No," said Mike, "but for the Lord's sake come with all your might and help me let him go." [Laughter.]

You gentlemen have been the champions of the civil-service law for years past, and now you come and ask us to help you to let it go. [Laughter and applause.] What have you to stand on now? You have abandoned the Cuban plank in your platform; you have abandoned bimetallism by any method. Your Secretary of the Treasury comes and tells us that his first purpose is more fully to establish the gold standard in this country. Now, having abandoned the Cuban plank and the bimetallic plank and the civil-service plank, I want to ask you, What have you left to stand on?

A MEMBER. HANNA.

Mr. VANDIVER. HANNA and Hannaism is the answer. Gentlemen, there are one or two other reflections that I should like to indulge in, but the limitation of my time forbids. I only wish to say that against this appropriation of $98,000 for keeping up the Civil Service Commission, which seems to have increased rather than decreased the burdens upon the people, I make a protest. But understand that I do not propose to come to your help with any modifications that will enable you to take what little there is left of the Government patronage out of the hands of the Democrats who happen to be the efficient servants of the Government in order to put in their places new and untried, inexperienced, and possibly incompetent men because they have been Republican followers. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for twenty minutes in the time of the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. MAHANY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to return thanks to the distinguished gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL] for his courtesy in granting me this time.

Let me preface my remarks with the statement that I shall vote for the civil-service appropriation in this bill. I believe heartily and sincerely in the principles of civil-service reform along the lines projected in the original act. The speeches already made during this discussion sufficiently demonstrate, however, that what was intended as a reform has grown to be an outrage. Gross abuses have crept into the administration of the law and these must be eliminated or the whole system is doomed to abolition. In conjunction, therefore, with the statement that I shall vote for the appropriation, I say also that if we are not permitted to vote for a modification of this law, I shall be one of those who will vote for its absolute repeal. [Applause.]

Judging from past experience, I am not unmindful of the fact that all who presume to criticise the workings of the existing statute, and all who venture to adduce suggestions in the direction of its fairer enforcement, will be exposed to that choice and vitrolic billingsgate which seems to be the chief ammunition employed by the high priests of the civil-service-reform cult.

Their courtesy seems only equaled by their ingenuousness. It has been shown in the course of this debate that by a process of strained construction, by a system of trickery unworthy the exponents and exemplars of reform, clerks are detailed from the various Departments of the Government to support this commission, and the statement has been made by a distinguished Representative from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], in a conference of Republican members opposed to the continuation of these wrongs, that it is beyond the power of this House to modify the action of this commission by striking out the appropriation; that owing to the fact that clerks can be thus detailed, the Civil Service Commissioners can defy the House of Representatives.

Why, Mr. Chairman, has it come to this? I was well aware that the pusillanimous attitude of this House as regards its own rules had reduced it to a position almost beneath contempt [applause on the Democratic side], but I did not realize that any body of American citizens, and especially public officers who had taken the oath of allegiance to the United States, would dare to say that they could defy the legislative branch of this Government. Yet these men are self-styled patriots, and all who differ with them, no matter how sincerely, are promptly denounced as spoilsmen.

Why is it that in any city of the United States, in any assemblage, gathered together without prearrangement, if a citizen sees fit to denounce the workings of the civil-service law, the applause is instant and intense? If the act is as popular as its advocates would have us believe, why has it never been submitted in any State or in the nation at large to a popular vote? So fas as I am aware, it never has. I defy any special pleader for this law to contradict that statement. It is apparently the purpose of those who defend the iniquities and the inequalities that have grown up under the guise of reform never to let the system go to a popular vote; and so persistent is their intention in this regard that they storm and rave at the proposition to bring the matter before the House of Representatives, a body that ought to be, though it lamentably is not, near to the popular heart. Do these civil-service reformers wish or intend that the will of the people shall prevail? Do they purpose that the discontent at the iniquitous administration and gross perversion of this law shall continue because the statute on its face is just and correct? Do they defy the people as well as the House of Representatives? Do they insist that there shall be no modification of this system? Will they run the risk of its total abolition? For General Grant once said that the quickest way to repeal an unfair law is to enforce it. The continuance of the abuses that have multiplied and are multiplying in the workings of this law will lead the American people to send to this House—yes, and to the Senate of the United States and to the Executive Mansion of the Republic—men who are pledged to an absolute repeal. [Applause.]

Consider for a moment the way in which the recent orders were rushed through. The advocates of everything pertaining to the so-called "merit system" say that the order of May 6 was promulgated on that day, whereas there is abundant reason to believe that the sweeping interpretation was given by the priests of the oracle January 12, 1897, two months or over after the McKinley Administration had been elected. However that may be, I have come to regard the question as likely to take rank with one of Archbishop Whatley's "Historic Doubts;" but in any event it is perfectly plain that the Civil Service Commission has manipulated the statute, not only to protect rank partisans in their places, but to create a life tenure of public office in the United States.

The declaration of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] that Congress can do nothing in regard to this law is a startling statement. To what a condition have we fallen! Under the despotic rules of this House on the one hand, and in accordance with his utterance on the other, it would seem that the representatives of the American people can neither enact new laws nor modify old ones.

As regards the civil-service act, however, we have possibly arrived at the summun bonum of legislation, we have doubtless discovered the lex sacra of the Republic. Why, my friends, the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States, backed by the legislatures in three-fourths of the States, are empowered to change even the Constitution of the United States, yet here is a civil-service law whose advocates defy the legislative branch of the Government either to repeal or to amend it.

I listened with much intentness to the speech of the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON]. He made a moving appeal to party loyalty and besought us to live up to the civil-service plank in our platform. Well, what does he say in regard to the fact that, though that same platform contained a plank in favor of struggling Cuba, a Republican majority in this House permits the Cuban resolutions to sleep the sleep of death in the Foreign Affairs Committee?

I will state to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROBB] that I will be one of the Republican majority who will vote to bring that resolution before this House. [Applause.] And I shall do it with no intention of flattering the galleries or courting popular applause, because in the Fifty-fourth Congress, when I believed that the Cubans had not conducted their warfare a sufficient length of time to receive under international law belligerent rights, I spoke on the floor against the consideration of such a resolution.

But I appeal to every authority of international law from Vattel to Hall for proof of the assertion that the Cubans have now more than won the right to recognition as belligerents. For three solid years they have maintained themselves with magnificent heroism and continued victories against the mother country, and Spain has failed utterly to demonstrate her supremacy in that dominion. [Applause.]

In 1883 the civil-service law was enacted in a burst of hysterics following the assassination of General Garfield, but it was not the spoils system alone that was responsible for the death of that illustrious man. It was the "boss" system as well that sent that soldier and statesman to his grave. The advocates of the civil-service measure assured the country then that once the spoils were eliminated as a factor in public affairs the bosses would simultaneously disappear. But after fifteen years of the civil-service law what do we find in the United States to-day? An epidemic of bossism such as was never dreamed of even in the wildest saturnalia of patronage. Our unhappy lot in this respect recalls to mind the saying of Livy in regard to ancient Rome, that she "could neither endure her ills nor suffer their cure." Look at the political condition in most of the States! It is simply an alternating monarchy of bossism. Defeat the Democratic boss and you get a Republican boss; defeat the Republican boss and you get a Democratic boss. [Laughter.] This is plain talk, but I am a citizen first of all and a partisan afterwards. I believe in the Republicanism of Abraham Lincoln, a Republicanism that had faith in the plain people, a Republicanism that did not fear to trust the dearest interests of the Republic to the rank and file of our citizens. [Applause.]

And while on the subject of bossism let me say, in passing, that we have a few self-anointed bosses in this House. [Laughter.]

The absurdities that have characterized in many respects the operation of the civil-service system have been sufficiently disclosed. I will point out but one more. There is a Federal building in process of construction in my city. I had the honor to be instrumental in securing most of the appropriations for that building, and, as we all know, one of the benefits of getting a Federal building, aside from its public utility, is the fact that it gives employment to residents of the vicinity. Two watchmen were necessary for the Buffalo building. The commission detailed one from Albany and another from Maine, a commentary on the intelligence of my city which I respectfully resent. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, we have heard so much abuse of the men who are conscientiously endeavoring to bring about some understanding as to this law, some method by which skilled and intelligent service may be retained in the interest of the Government and at the same time no life tenure be imposed upon the people, and we have encountered so many sneers from the advocates of the existing system, that I am constrained to point out some of the inconsistencies of those who, in this discussion at least, assume to be higher and holier than their fellow-men. I believe its strongest defenders are to be found in New England, and therefore I adduce some examples of New English zeal for civil-service reform.

There is in Boston a great dry-goods establishment whose proprietor is a most intense and persistent advocate of the present system, and what is his course in dealing with his own employees? He pays young girls from $1.50 to $6 a week for serving from 8 o'clock in the morning until 6 o'clock at night, with half an hour allowed for lunch. That is a sample of his personal and an index to his political character. He pays $1.50 a week to a young girl and expects her to support herself upon that salary, and if she is late three times, even though her tardiness be only for a moment, she is discharged.

Yet this man, who wields an autocracy over his subordinates not equaled anywhere except in the dominions of the Czar, says that the Government of the United States shall not have the right to dispense with the services of a lazy, insolent, and inefficient employee save through the procedure of charges preferred and trial held, in most of which cases the dispute would narrow down to a question of veracity between the subordinate and his superior officer.

On this subject let me present the testimony of a Cabinet officer in the present Administration, one who has a Department that is less affected by the civil-service law than any other. He told me that since the President's recent order requiring a trial before removal, the insolence engendered by that order has almost destroyed the efficiency of the force in his Department. There is testimony contemporaneous, and in our own political household, at that.

Let me adduce another instance of New England civil-service sanctity—Josiah Quincy, late First Assistant Secretary of State under the Cleveland Administration. This man had been a howling dervish of the "merit system," yet when he was installed in that office, his administration of it was so rank, it so smelled to heaven, that even the violet-scented civil-service Administration of Grover Cleveland could no longer endure him, and he was kicked out of the Department and bore with him the sinister title of "The Looter of the Consular and Diplomatic Service." [Laughter and applause.]

And, my friends, if you will look over the list of those whose especial province it is to pose as the champions of this "reform" you will find it bristling with just such examples as these—on the one hand men who would not for a moment tolerate in their own business the very system which they wish maintained and perpetuated in the Government of the United States, and, on the other hand, individuals who violate every principle of the system the moment they secure offices for themselves.

Mr. FITZGERALD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MAHANY. If my time can be extended.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to ask the gentleman if Mr. Quincy removed anyone while he was Assistant Secretary who was under the operation of the civil-service law?

Mr. MAHANY. I am speaking of Mr. Quincy's action in that office as in direct contradiction of all his previous philippics against the spoils system and in direct contravention of his civil-service professions. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for his interruption, because it brings to mind the fact that Mr. Quincy had hardly been inducted into office before he affronted the memory of the illustrious Blaine by removing with insult and contumely every man in the consular and diplomatic service who was known to be a friend of the great Secretary of State.

Mr. FITZGERALD rose.

Mr. MAHANY. The gentleman will permit me to add, further, that I think the selection by Mr. Blaine of a consular or diplomatic officer was in itself a sufficient civil-service examination.

Mr. FITZGERALD. May I ask the gentleman another question—whether he was one of those gentlemen appointed by Mr. Blaine and whether he also was removed by Mr. Quincy?

Mr. MAHANY. I shared the fate of the others, one of whom was Mr. Stevens, of Maine, then United States minister to the Hawaiian Islands. This representative of our Government received an insulting telegram of recall while standing by the dead body of his daughter, who had been drowned while returning from a pleasure trip to the United States man-of-war Boston. In the history of the State Department the administration of Josiah Quincy is still, and will ever remain, a malodorous memory.

Now let me say a word to the advocates of the merit system from the view point of examinations. I see before me many university men—many from my own university. I should like to ask these Harvard men—because I know more about the conditions of Harvard than I do about those of any other university—I should like to ask them whether any one of them to-day could pass the entrance examination to that institution, though perhaps they may hold its highest graduation degree? Education is not a test of fitness. Education at best is but the knowledge of formulated experience. The experience itself is the desideratum in the public service. This can be obtained by natural aptitude and ability fully as well as by the study of books.

The advocates of this law, in urging a life tenure, also lose sight of the fact that in this Republic we have different conditions from those that prevail under Old World monarchies. The people of England—the plain people, the common people, if you will, of Europe, because they have "common" people over there—expect little and receive less from the public servants. The appointments come from the higher strata down. It is the younger sons of the aristocracy and the dependents of the classes that receive public office there. And the masses, understanding that fact, do not expect much else but insolence at their hands. When the lower orders receive courtesy, it is in the nature of a favor and not as a right.

But in the United States it is the glory of this Republic that the people own the Government, that the people are the Government, that public officials, if not the servants, are at least the representatives of the people. And when you put a life-tenure class in office, you remove from that class the necessity for courtesy in dealing with public affairs. There is not a Representative on this floor who, if he speaks the inward feelings of his heart, will not admit that the courtesy of the Departments has vastly decreased since the inauguration of this system.

Why, sir, from the standpoint of results, take, for example, the Chinese Empire. For unnumbered centuries, for countless æons of time, that monarchy has had a civil service based upon education and severe examinations. Yet to-day behold the condition of China—dismembered, the laughter of the Orient, the booty of the West. And shall anyone say that we here to-day, breathing atoms of an hour, are not dealing with legislation that may undermine the now solid foundations of this Government? The establishment of a life tenure in office is the first step in the decay of the Republic. The so-called merit system, in the extension of its abuses, means nothing more or less than the divorcement of the people from all influence in their own Government.

My friend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] said that it is a preposterous supposition that "any fellow" can hold a public office. Well, over against that statement I put the epigram of the Duke of Newcastle—and I indorse neither authority—that "a man is capable of administering any job he can get." [Laughter.]

But rising higher than either statement, it is the pride of the American Republic, it is the greatest glory of our Government, that almost any man you meet on the street in any city, town, or hamlet of the Union is capable of being Chief Magistrate of the United States, and if capable of wielding its supreme power, certainly fit to administer a subordinate office.

How long do you think the people—and I address myself to Republicans, though you of the Democratic side bear equal responsibility for this law, because it was conceived by a Democrat to cripple the Republican party; it was foisted upon the people by George H. Pendleton, a Democratic Senator from Ohio, and then the intolerants of both parties united to extend and perpetuate it—how long do you think the people will stand a system of government which renders it impossible for them to change its complexion or alter its personnel? How long do you think they will endure to see the insolence of their servants bulwarked by this law?

For my own part I have no selfish purpose in this address. My sole desire is to aid in rectifying an existing wrong. We are all advocates of the law, but some of us refuse to sanction its perversion. For this attitude we are threatened with political extermination. But I make the counter prediction that Republicans and Democrats alike who persist in forcing civil-service abuses and inequalities upon the American people will be swept clean from this Chamber at the next election. [Applause.]

This is not, nor should it be, a party question. It affects the rights and interests of the whole people. The patriots of all parties, therefore, should unite for its dispassionate and just solution. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. BODINE. Before the gentleman takes his seat, I wish to ask him this question: Will he join with us in voting for the absolute repeal of the law?

Mr. MAHANY. If no measure of modification is presented, I shall certainly vote for repeal. [Applause.]

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes of the time allotted to me to my colleague from Ohio [Mr. KERR].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I understood that I was to be recognized next.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Georgia misunderstood him. It was the purpose of the Chair to recognize the gentleman from Georgia after the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTHWAY] had concluded. If the gentleman from Georgia got a different impression, it was the misfortune of the Chair in not expressing himself clearly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The only interest I have in the matter is that a gentleman who is to leave in the morning has been promised by me ten minutes of my time to occupy this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that he will recognize the gentleman from Georgia after the gentleman from Ohio concludes his remarks, which will occupy but twenty minutes, and thus enable his friend to take the floor this afternoon, as he has suggested.

Mr. KERR Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] in his speech yesterday painted a beautiful picture from the brilliant colors of his imagination. Upon the wings of his opalescent oratory he carried us to the borderland of the millennium, but when the magician's spell was broken and we came back to earth, we are still confronted by the condition which his brief enchantment neither remedied nor dispelled.

How eloquent he was when he portrayed the time and the situation when the President of this mighty Republic would be far removed from patronage and place, dealing alone with great questions of state; but when will that come? How forceful he was in his description of the persistent quadrennial tide which beats against the White House door; but when is that to ebb? Not, certainly, when civil-service reform is inaugurated, because that was done long ago, and we now have a broad and comprehensive system in force. And notwithstanding this, during this Administration more than ever before, has this restless and relentless tide surged up to the door of the Executive Mansion, poured along its corridors, to beat and beat and beat upon the defenseless and devoted head of the President.

The gentleman's argument is an illustration how sometimes a single fact will tumble to ruins a splendid oratorical structure. While he was blinding us with the flashes of his Excalibur the civil-service army, 90,000 strong, was marching on, and at the same moment the White House was under siege and the besieging army larger than ever. If there is anything in the argument, your millennium should be here. It is sufficient to say that with the civil service the pressure upon the Executive has not been removed, but, on the contrary, aggravated.

Mr. Chairman, I have no expectation of adding anything to the store of knowledge on the subject, and I shall be content if I am able to present my individual opinion of the present civil-service system with sufficient clearness to be understood. Neither party was quite honest in the passage, and neither party has been quite honest in its dealing with the civil-service law.

This law was introduced by a Democratic Senator, its enactment was vigorously opposed by a large number of prominent Democratic Senators, and its passage through the Senate was very largely the result of Republican argument and support. It was then charged and believed with great unanimity, by the Democrats at least, that in the passage of this law the Republican party was preparing for the defeat of 1884. There were some signs of the times pointing in that direction, and the subsequent event—the defeat of Blaine—seemed to verify the charge.

No one on either side seriously doubts but that Cleveland's order of May 6, 1896, and its subsequent execution bringing over 30,000 employees into the classified service was preparatory to and the result of the downfall of his party in the elections of that year. The order was promulgated after the Cleveland Democracy was on the plank—it was not until after his party had adopted a new creed and was searching for a new god that Cleveland conceived the idea of tying the hands of his successor, whether he should be a Republican or a new dispensation Democrat.

During Cleveland's first term and up to the time he was defeated he extended the civil service to only 1,939 places, but in December, 1888, after the election of his successor, he included the Railway Mail Service, aggregating 5,320 persons.

Harrison's love for the civil service was about as capricious. In three years and three-quarters of his official term as President he added to the classified service 1,080 places only; but after his defeat, and on January 5, 1893, when the tread of the returning Democratic army, hungry and thirsty, sounded in his ears, he rescued from its clutch 7,610 places by an extension.

During the first two years of Cleveland's second term he only classified about 6,000 places; but when the handwriting appeared upon the wall his repentance was as marvelous because as quickly wrought as that of Paul. From that on he outran the most immaculate civil-service reformer by covering in nearly 35,000 public servants as a sign of his conversion causa mortis.

So it appears, Mr. Chairman, that the present civil service has grown, not from the wholesome promptings of public sentiment, not in the sunshine and plenitude of power, but it has crept upon us from behind the shadows of party defeat, and these extensions sprang from no higher or holier motive than a disposition and a desire to wrench from a triumphant foe the fruits of victory. No party ever extended it materially in the day of victory.

These additions and extensions and Executive orders have carried the system far beyond anything contemplated, expected, or desired by those instrumental in passing the law in 1883. When the bill was under discussion in the Senate it was predicted that the power of removal would be questioned if it became a law, and that the general condition which now confronts us would arise. The claim was strongly denied by the friends of the bill, and Senator HAWLEY, the chairman of the Senate Civil Service Committee, expressed himself as follows upon that subject:

> For myself, then, I say distinctly—and not that it is in the bill or that any of us have tried to put it in the bill—that the executive chiefs of higher or lower grades should have a certain power of dismissal over their men at any time, and we can not have a decent public service without it. (See volume 59, RECORD, page 355.)

Compare this with the present situation. Public officers of low degree are appealing to the courts for the extraordinary power of injunction to keep their superiors from changing them at discretion. Soon they will be testing titles to clerkships by quo warranto and seeking to have inductions into appointive places by mandamus.

After that we may expect that it will be claimed, and no doubt sustained, that charges looking to removal shall be as specific as an indictment at common law. The next step will be a system of pleading—motions and demurrers—to try the sufficiency of the complaint, and all this must precede a hearing upon the merits. This will involve the right to counsel and appeal. The fiscal operations of the Government will be embarrassed by struggles about removals. Subordinates will defy superiors and appeal to the law. Discipline will be impaired, and each holder will look upon his place as a vested right. Incumbents will wrap themselves metaphorically in the Constitution and defy the Government.

A postmaster in the South the other day refused to surrender to his successor, who had been duly appointed and qualified, and barricaded his office against the Government. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General, as the representative of the nation, was sent to treat with him for peace.

The janitor of the public building at Atlanta refuses to lay down his broom and dustpan, the insignias of his office. I suppose a representative of the War Department will be sent to treat with this knight of the cuspidors.

The next thing we know some sweeper in a custom-house will defy the flag, and a war ship will be sent to fire a shot across his bows, preparatory to asking him to surrender.

I would avoid all this by turning them out "without benefit of clergy." I would copy the methods employed by business men in their private affairs. I would select good men, and I would keep them good by the power of discharge. There is no power so persuasive or stimulating to good behavior as the unlimited power of removal. There is nothing, in my judgment, which would more demoralize the public service or private business than to abridge the power of removal or discharge. [Applause.]

It is the fashion now to put down those who inveigh against the present civil-service system by calling them spoilsmen. I see them upon a much higher plane. I do not consider office seeking a crime. It is the exercise of one of the rights of American citizenship. If Senators and Members of Congress consulted their own ease simply, all of them would be for civil service. It would relieve them of the responsibility of indorsement and much labor. I do not believe that the power to secure the appointment of a few men in your district strengthens a member, but, on the contrary, it is likely to weaken him in the disappointment of others.

So, for these reasons, and others as apparent, I am inclined to look upon the opposition to the present civil service as an honest and intelligent sentiment, and not simply a selfish, personal-serving disposition to secure office. I believe it is the outgrowth of an opinion that the present status does not reflect an honest effort to inaugurate genuine civil service, but rather a successful attempt to wrest from the Republican party the legitimate results of its victory. Many things confirm this opinion. This law has now been in force for fourteen years, yet hardly 10 per cent of the present classified service were appointed upon examination. An honest effort would have dictated a different course.

If it were civil-service reform instead of the old-fashioned greed for office, why did they not displace the barnacles with men who had been arrayed in the immaculate linen and scented with the rose-water of the Civil Service Commission? As it is, there are 28,000 of the elect upon the eligible lists waiting for appointment until the Democratic ward heelers now in office shall die and give them place.

If a civil-service examination is the best method of determining a man's fitness for office and civil service is intended to elevate and render more efficient the public service, why keep these thousands who have been examined waiting the demise of the thousands who have not been?

Why do you not provide that as soon as eligibles are provided for a certain service, those filling it who come in by political preferment shall give way to the elect? If you are honest, why do you not bring the present service under the civil service in fact as well as in name? The little leaven that has been put in will hardly leaven the lump. As long as this condition exists men who believe in a merit system will look upon this as a sort of a political confidence game, or, if not that, a spurious reform arrayed in stolen vestments.

I do not believe that a limited civil service is contrary to the spirit of American institutions or that it is un-American, as some allege, but I am firmly of the opinion that such a civil service as we now have, as it is now exemplified in this Government, weakens some of the safeguards of the Republic. There are many nice philosophies about the duties of citizens—that they should look above party to country and that the line between partisans and patriots is and should be kept broad and distinct. But good as this is, it is still true that this is a party Government and that all its great policies are determined and controlled by party principles.

This fact is better illustrated in the practical workings of the British Government than in ours. There the party in power is the Government, and it goes out immediately upon a vote of want of confidence. The strength of our Government is largely in party pride.

Whenever I hear a man declaiming against partisanship, I know where he belongs, and that he lacks some of the fibers of good citizenship. A citizen can become potential for good government better through one of the great political parties, and the man who gathers up his skirts and goes by himself loses the largest opportunity to do good. Gentlemen who find both the parties much too corrupt for them are the same people who are always worshiping at the shrine of the unattainable; their hearts never burn with the patriotic fires of party spirit, and they characterize efforts for party advancement and for public employment as vulgar scrambles for spoils.

They are also the same people who believe that great party organizations, such as followed Garfield to victory and Hancock to defeat in 1880, ought to be controlled and guided by the eunuchs and sissies of American politics. Their services being declined, they turn reformers. Men who devote their lives honestly and generously to reforms have my gratitude and commendation, but men who follow politics until they lose their potentiality and then seek a connection where potentiality is not an essential quality are not the kind of reformers I have mentioned.

I do not regard strong party allegiance as a danger, but rather a thing to be cultivated. It is now a hundred years since Washington left with his countrymen his Farewell Address, and yet at no moment since has the country been in danger from the heat and rancor of party spirit. Even the war does not furnish an example. That contest was sectional, and it was waged to preserve a sectional institution. It obliterated party lines South, and welded the great majority of the Southern people into one party, regardless of previous affiliations. And to some extent, and particularly at some times, was this true of the Northern people during the period of the civil war.

In my experience parties contend most fiercely when the victory is uncertain and when their strength is nearly equal. And it is just then that the country is most secure; just then that honest government is most certain; just then that the dominant party is put on its good behavior.

But let a time come when party spirit cools, when men care little to which party they belong, or whether they belong to any, and just at that point danger begins. Whenever the people begin to lose interest in the Government, the Government begins to weaken.

The moment you debar the people from a share in the Government patronage as a right under our free institutions and not as a prize of a grammar-school examination—the moment you debar them of that right, not as a reward for party service, but as a reward of citizenship, you pull a pillar from under the temple of our liberties. This desire to participate in the Government of the nation is not so much for individual participation as for party control. It is not for the spoils of office, but a desire that the friends of an Administration shall sustain it.

As I stated before, the present civil service extends far beyond the anticipation of its friends at the beginning and verifies many of the predictions of its enemies. Senator Pendleton, its author, thought it might embrace 10,000 places. It was predicted in its passage through the Senate that under the law, when in operation, the power of removal, without which no service can be good, would be questioned, embarrassed, limited, and then denied; and that has all come to pass. A tenure at will has blossomed into an indefeasible life estate. At the beginning it was neither suggested nor dreamed of that in fifteen years this commission of mediocres, this resting place for weary and reduced statesmen, would wield more power in the general service of the Government than the President. But that, too, has come to pass. It was not thought that they were creating a bureau which would soon dictate to Cabinet officers about petty appointments of confidential or personal employees. This also has come to pass. A Cabinet officer of this Administration desired the service of a man who had long been in his employ—desired his services in his office or near him, and for what he was perfectly competent. This man was appointed a laborer, at laborer's wages, and then detailed to the duties of a messenger at the door of the Secretary. Immediately the Secretary was called upon by this commission for an explanation, and a demand was made on him to return the employee to the cellar of the State Department. What a spectacle! A Cabinet minister under orders from a commission.

Within a few days a suit was brought in one of the Federal courts of Arkansas by an officeholder, praying that his superior be enjoined from making an appointment in his stead. In the suit the court was pressed to hold that the rules and regulations promulgated by the Civil Service Commission had the force and effect of laws. This proposition, if it should receive the sanction of judicial decision, would recognize in this commission the power to legislate and be an encroachment upon the constitutional power of Congress. Of course, I have no fear that this will or can be done, but it illustrates the extremes to which this system has been forced.

It shows a disposition to file away even the provisions of the Constitution itself. The power to appoint, except that expressly vested in the President, is to be given by Congress to "the President alone, to courts of law, or to the heads of Departments." While the civil-service rules and regulations do not directly encroach upon this constitutional power of Congress, nor perhaps infringe existing laws regulating the same, yet it strips from the appointing power many of its important and essential functions and gives us a modern instance of "Hobson's choice." The appointing officer's discretion is limited to a narrow circle, and he is deprived of the ordinary and generally the most satisfactory means of determining an applicant's fitness for the place.

He is presented three or four names from which to select, and his selection must depend wholly upon the grades set opposite these names. The whole story must be learned from the per centums. You might as well undertake to appreciate the sublimities of the ocean by studying a drop of water or a grain of sand.

I would rather see the man behind the per centums or some one who knew him. At least, I would want to know what the figures were a per centum of. All things improve under proper environment, and I suppose the examinations have improved. I have no doubt they have; but if some of the questions provided under the law of 1871 are still used, the perfect grade ought to be elevated to a thousand or two.

Let me give you two or three of those questions, to show, if nothing else, the ancestry of the present system. A man can sometimes live down his ancestry, and the civil service may have improved so that we should forget its ridiculous beginning. One of the questions was as follows:

Two-thirds of seven-ninths of what number is one-half of eight and two-fifths divided by fourteen and seven-tenths less fourteen and two-sevenths?

Another was as follows:

A pole 84 feet high, standing on a horizontal plane, being broken, the top portion adheres to the base portion and falls till its free end strikes the ground 24 feet from the base of the upright portion. Required: The length of each portion of the broken pole.

Another one, the most wonderful of all—I have no doubt the man who concocted it has gone above, where alone such a genius could be rewarded—is as follows:

A man weighing 72 pounds runs with a velocity of 6 against a standing but not resisting man whose weight is 96 pounds. What is the result?

Of course, after a man had figured this out or given an ocular demonstration of it, and if he had escaped the idiot asylum or punishment for assault and battery, he would make a splendid clerk or deputy revenue collector, or fill admirably a position in the customs service.

Excluding the places which were classified when the law was first put into operation, the total of places brought in by Republican Executive action is 8,690, and the total brought in by Democratic Executive action is 49,027. And just here, and in connection with these civil-service extensions made by a Democratic President, we see a peculiarity of the Democratic party. In this, as in most other things, the Democratic brethren have no pride in the achievements of their party. Is it not a little queer that they take no pride in its history until they reach ancient times. Suppose the Democratic party was getting up a pantheon. Whom would they put in it? They have no heroes until they reach Jefferson.

Cleveland they have disowned. Buchanan they have been trying to forget. Pierce and Polk they have forgotten, and even the old tradition of Jacksonian simplicity has been lost in the oriental splendor of the McLeans and the Brices.

How different it is with the Republican party. We are proud of the record from the first victory in 1860 to this hour. In the mighty edifice of history are our jewels; written on its walls are the great deeds of the Republican party, and enthroned upon pedestals of honor are its great dead. There is Lincoln and Grant and Garfield, a splendid triumvir. Match them if you can.

My objections to the civil service as it is at present exhibited in the country are not grounded upon any disappointment in getting places. I am in the category of those who are blessed because they expect little. I am in favor of a merit system with limited tenure and confined to the Departments. The examinations should be under the control of those who are responsible for the service. The qualifications should be fixed by those who have charge of the work to be done, and not by a commission which has no responsibility for or knowledge of or affinity with the branch of Government for which it furnishes employees. The head of a bureau knows better the kind of men he needs for the work intrusted to him than any outside commission, however pure it may be.

Mr. HANDY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KERR. I will say to the gentleman that I have only twenty minutes, and unless I can have enough added to my time, following the illustrious precedents in this House in this discussion, I shall have to decline.

I object to the present service because it has unloaded upon this Administration the political opponents of the Cleveland Administration. I object to it because it is an injustice to that magnificent army of Republicans who followed McKinley to victory. The Republicans did not contend for reward or the hope of it in 1896, but after the victory is won it is mighty irritating to see the vanquished still holding the breastworks and standing guard. There might be some justification for prohibiting or so hedging about the power of removal as to render it substantially nugatory as to those who come in upon examination or through the civil-service law, but upon what ground is it right to intrench in office thousands whose only title was the recommendation of a county committee or the certificate of a captain of a hundred?

The decree of no power, high or low, can make this satisfactory to the Republican party. It is not office they want, but justice. It is not a reasonable civil-service law that they are fighting, but the prostitution of the present system to the perpetuation in office of a class who have no right or claim to the protection of the law. The last extension of Cleveland's was not made until after the most expert manipulators in the Treasury and Interior had loaded the Government with Democratic politicians—loaded it with men who are such robust politicians that they could not live a day in the rarified atmosphere of the Civil Service Commission. Some of them would perish as soon as the moral environment was reached. I know a case from Ohio.

There is a man holding a position of some importance here whom the records of the court at his home show to be guilty of embezzlement as a public officer. But this man is held in by a system supposed to purify public affairs and some honest man whom I could suggest is kept out. This is but one instance of many. Every county and nearly every community has such a case. It is not wonderful, then, that there is a widespread belief that it is not for the good of the Government to perpetuate in whole the present service.

For fifty years the world has laughed at the English Barnacle held aloft on the sharp spear of Dickens's wit. If the signs of the times augur right, the American species will not live long enough to be thus immortalized. [Applause.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON was recognized, and yielded ten minutes to Mr. BARTHOLDT.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I have applauded much of what the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, said yesterday when he pointed out the wrongs connected with the present civil-service system, and, as an honest advocate of the principles underlying that system, I am willing to go a great way with the gentleman in the direction of a radical improvement of the law and the correction of the notorious abuses complained of. But I desire first to enter my emphatic protest against the unwarrantable assaults made by the same gentleman on the personal character of the president of the Civil Service Reform League, Hon. Carl Schurz. Whatever his provocation, he should have remembered, especially at this moment, when he is endeavoring to convince members of the righteousness of his cause, that slander is no argument. The good cause of an improvement of the law and of its methods of administration is much stronger than might be inferred from the vituperative language of my friend from Ohio, who has clearly weakened his position by his personal attacks on one who, to say the least, sincerely believes in the wisdom as well as efficacy of the present civil-service system.

I do not think Carl Schurz needs a defense at my hands, but he is now a private citizen, and as such is at a disadvantage in any defense he may see fit to make against the attack of General GROSVENOR. This is the reason why I take the floor at this time, which otherwise I should not have thought of doing. Whatever may be said about Carl Schurz, his public record and career, the only just pretext, or even the only just ground, for attack upon him is a possible difference of opinion between him and those who criticise him. But up to this time no man, as far as I know, has ever dared to assail his private character or question his personal honesty and integrity. As much as many of his countrymen may differ from him politically, to them and to the nation he has always presented the majestic figure of an honest man.

My friend from Ohio must place a very low estimate upon the moral susceptibilities of the German-American if he imagines that Mr. Schurz could have retained their respect so long if the least stain attached to his character, or if, as the gentleman from Ohio puts it, "no point could be found in the trail of his political history which was not tainted with political corruption." The very thought is an insult to that element which knows him best and is best acquainted with every step in his political career. The worst that can be charged against Carl Schurz is his peculiarity of a certain independence of judgment which is incompatible with party discipline.

But this independence in political affairs is characteristic of his nationality, and history bears me out when I say that as a nation we have not felt the worse for it. His very first public act was one of daring independence. When yet a student and hardly of age, he liberated his teacher, Professor Kinkel, who had been incarcerated for his participation in the revolutionary movement whose object was to abolish the monarchy and to establish American institutions in the fatherland. This brought young Schurz to the United States. Since that time—that is, for nearly a half a century—he has been an American citizen, and as such has taken a most active and prominent part in public affairs.

When the war broke out he took up arms for the Union, and his military career was as successful as it was honorable. Upon his return to Missouri he was instrumental in securing the reenfranchisement of those who, because of their sympathies with the South, had been deprived of their citizens' rights. He then became United States Senator, minister to Spain, and a member of the Cabinet of President Hayes, and while often criticised—like every public man is criticised—none of his most spiteful defamers ever went so far as to charge him with corruption. His record is an open book, the most important periods of his eventful life are within the memory of nearly every member of this body, and I challenge anyone to point out a single official act in his career as general, as Senator, as minister, or as Secretary of the Interior that is not characterized by sincerity and honesty of purpose. If his official life teaches a lesson at all, it proves that it is possible to stay in American public life for a generation and yet remain an honest man.

He should have remained with the Republican party, it is said. So say I; but to question his sincerity when in 1872 he joined the liberal movement, and when in 1884 his free-trade proclivities led him into the Democratic camp, would be as unjust as to charge the Democrats who could not swallow the 16 to 1 pill with corruption. I am a party man, and believe in the individual subordinating his views as to minor details and side issues to those of the majority of the party. We all have to do that from time to time if we would maintain party organization. But when vital interests are at stake, when in a national campaign the people are called upon to decide one great issue, then a citizen merely does his duty by his country and exercises his right of American citizenship when he disregards party and votes in accordance with his own honest convictions. This is all Carl Schurz has done, and while I deplore his desertion from our ranks, I respect him more for having drawn the logical consequences of his political beliefs than if he had remained in the party, a dangerous dissenter in its ranks.

It is impossible in the short space of time allotted to me to do full justice to that great American statesman. As an original abolitionist he stood at the cradle of the Republican party. As an orator of marked ability, he lent his great influence and rare ability to the cause of Lincoln and the Union. He fought bravely for his country, and after the war devoted himself unselfishly to the task of popularizing Republican principles. As Secretary of the Interior he distinguished himself by his recommendations for the education of Indian children and for the allotment of their land in severalty, as also by his practical suggestions for the rational protection of our forests (and of this movement he is the unquestioned pioneer of the country), and as a private citizen he has for many years been advocating, by word of mouth and pen, and devoting his time and energy to the promotion of the patriotic cause of international peace and of civil-service reform.

As a loyal American citizen he has demonstrated in the political arena, as well as in literature and in war, his extraordinary talents and rare ability, and, above all, his faithful and unselfish devotion to the best interests of his adopted country. He is now enjoying the evening of his life. We can justly say of him, "He has made his mark," and no amount of traducement can lessen the esteem in which he is held by a vast majority of the American people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, nobody regrets more than myself the necessity that compels me this evening to rise and occupy a few moments of your time. I had hoped that in this my first session in Congress I might be able to sit and listen to the older and wiser heads that sit about me here today. However, an attack having been unjustly made upon the organization of which I have the honor to be a member, I feel that I would be less than worthy of the high honor which Tammany Hall has conferred upon me if I failed to rise and to resent it.

Tammany Hall has been attacked in this body as the most corrupt political organization in the United States. Nature has wisely provided that in all bodies, natural or artificial, whether the life be animal or vegetable, that where decay and corruption break in that it would perish of itself and fall under its own weight. Tammany Hall is a political organization which was born with the birth of our country. It has survived all the vicissitudes of time and all the changes of fortune. Long before the body of which you are members was ever thought of Tammany Hall was in existence. It will last long after you and your party have passed away. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Tammany Hall has been in power ever since I can recollect in the city of New York, and under a wave of public sentiment it was swept out of office.

A hybrid organization composed of you Republicans and so-called reformers were able to deceive the people into the belief that Tammany Hall had been guilty of the grossest corruption. The promises which you made you were never able to carry out. You had power for three years in our city; you expended over $300,000 of the public funds, and you could not find that a single penny of the public money had ever been misappropriated. That is Tammany Hall! Tammany Hall gave us a system of public schools that is a model for the rest of the civilized world. We have there a fire department which is known throughout the world as the bravest, and a police department which is known as the finest in every place in the world.

Tammany Hall has been anxious to show its patriotism. It sent a regiment at its own expense in time of war to protect the unity of our Government. It gave us the wisest and best administration of the municipal power with the lowest tax rate that was ever known in the city of New York. Tammany Hall! You abuse it. Why, Tammany Hall's popularity was best shown by the election which the people of our city, the imperial city of the Western Continent, had over a month ago. With a population in the Greater New York equal to the population of the United States when it first became the United States, a population even greater, with equal wealth, with equal intelligence, the city of New York was more anxious to bring Tammany Hall back to power than it was to get rid of it a few years ago.

Tammany Hall! Its strength with the people will best be shown when at the next Congressional election—and mark the prediction I make—it will present a united and harmonious delegation to the Fifty-sixth Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let any Republican Representative from the State of New York rise upon this floor and give any just ground of complaint against our organization.

As to the general merits of this bill, let the responsibility rest with you. I know that it is very little that I can influence you in regard to the action you will take. You have the responsibility upon your shoulders and it rests with you to do one thing or the other. We of the city of New York, representatives of the Democracy, have always been anxious to help you throughout all the United States in time of famine, in time of fire, or of other calamity. We, the regular Democratic organization of Tammany Hall, resent the insult so grossly and unjustly cast upon us. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FARIS. Before I took my seat I forgot to ask consent to incorporate in my remarks some matter which I was not able to speak. I should like to have consent to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request of the gentleman from Indiana will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4751, and had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 8, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON HON. SETH L. MILLIKEN.

Mr. BURLEIGH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That Saturday, January 15, 1898, be set apart for paying tribute to the memory of Hon. SETH L. MILLIKEN, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Maine.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. MOODY, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. HOPKINS in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, any law that creates a life tenure in office or a class of officials removed from the direct control of the people is most obnoxious to a republican form of government.

We have been taught to believe that every American citizen is guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States equal rights and privileges, but in these modern days of civil-service reform we find an official class elevated above and beyond the control of the common people and held in their positions by the civil-service law.

The gregarious instinct of human nature seems to permeate in the present age of our history every avenue of human life.

In the great commercial affairs of our country we find the gigantic sugar trust, the Standard Oil trust, the sole-leather trust, the American tobacco trust, the beef, whisky, baking, and other trusts, organized for the purpose of controlling the price of these great commodities, to the great injury of the people. In our traffic affairs we find railroad combinations and pools organized for the purpose of destroying competition and forcing from the people an unjust revenue on inflated capital.

In the telegraph, telephone, and electric cable lines we find the hand of the monopolist paying dividends on watered stocks.

And here, at the very capital of the nation, we find a gigantic civil-service trust, a soulless, close corporation, organized for the purpose of monopolizing the public service and perpetuating in office for life a privileged class.

They control the appointment of nearly 100,000 employees, annually drawing from the people the munificent sum of nearly $50,000,000.

Do you wonder that they are willing to give their unselfish time and services for the meager compensation of $3,500 a year?

They determine, without power to revise or appeal from their decision, who shall be certified into the classified list, and under the rules of this commission an executive officer is compelled to select from three of the chosen few certified by the board.

The illustrious men who drafted the Constitution of this country, mindful of the rights of the people and jealous of the development of autocratic power, wisely provided that all appointments of the Chief Executive should be submitted to and be confirmed by the Senate.

How frequently has the Senate exercised the supervisory power granted by the Constitution and rejected the nominations of the President?

This constitutional restriction of power has been the fundamental principle of our form of government and the greatest safeguard to national life and individual liberty.

What do you suppose the original advocates of this law would have said to a proposition to bring within its provisions the doctors, lawyers, architects, engineers, and other skilled men in the different professions required in our public service?

Think of an American citizen, educated in one of our great institutions of learning, holding a diploma certifying to his qualification for one of these professions requiring knowledge, skill, and experience to secure, submitting himself to a civil-service examination by a board composed of unprofessional men and a clerical force of young men and women whose ability may be measured and ambitions in life gratified by a thousand to twelve hundred dollar job.

The original advocates of the civil-service law would have scorned with contempt a suggestion that its provisions should be extended so as to embrace such minor positions as watchman, elevator conductor, messenger, janitor, fireman, and like positions, where fidelity to the performance of duty and physical attainments constitute the essential requisites for the position.

Let me call your attention now to some of the opinions and remarks of men who advocated the measure at the time of its adoption, and who took part in the debate on that occasion.

Senator Pendleton, of Ohio, the great apostle of civil-service reform, in discussing this measure, stated—

> That it only applied to employees in the Departments at Washington, and large offices employing over 50 clerks—not over 10,000 employees all told.

In his report on the bill to the Senate, he stated:

> This bill does not touch the question of tenure of office, or removals from office, except that removals shall not be made for refusing to pay political assessments or to perform partisan service. It leaves both where it finds them.

But how is it now?

Would that his spirit might return to the earth and witness the gigantic monopoly of public service, the creation of a privileged class, the establishment of a life tenure in office, the denial of the right of removal, and the usurpation of the rights of American citizens to which the law has been extended. In my judgment, the remorse of his spirit at the sight of this civil-service octopus would be worse than the torments of hades.

Let us refer to some of the remarks of our leading Senators on this measure, and thereby ascertain the original scope and purpose of the act.

Senator Voorhees, of Indiana, in his remarks in support of the bill, declared:

> That of the 100,000 employees of the Government, 90,000 of the higher grades, those of importance, those of power, for good or evil, are left untouched.

Senator HAWLEY of Connecticut, in discussing this bill December 16, 1882, said:

> That the executive chiefs of higher or lower grade should have a certain power of dismissal over their men at any time, and we can not have a decent public service without it.

Senator Ingalls, of Kansas, in discussing this bill in the Senate December 16, 1882, said:

> This bill appears to be supported by each party for the purpose of cheating the other. It is sustained by one party upon grounds that are absolutely adverse to those on which it is supported by the other, and it will end by defrauding both.

He has lived to witness this prophecy.

This measure—

Said Ingalls—

> was not devised by either political party in this Senate. It was sent here by a self-constituted commission of exceedingly holy, wise, and upright apostles of civil-service reform outside of this Senate.

It was there, an illegitimate child of irresponsible parentage. Its growth has developed the naturally grasping tentacles of its satanic creator.

In his first message to Congress, in 1882, President Arthur wisely said:

> In my judgment, no man should be the incumbent of an office the duties of which he is for any cause unfit to perform, who is lacking in the ability, fidelity, or integrity which a proper administration of such office demands.
> This sentiment would, doubtless, meet with general acquiescence, but opinion has been widely divided upon the wisdom and practicability of the various reformatory schemes which have been suggested and of certain proposed regulations governing appointments to public service.
> The efficiency of such regulations has been distrusted, mainly because they have seemed to exalt mere educational and abstract tests above general business capacity and even special fitness for the particular work in hand. It seems to me that the rules which should be applied to the management of public service may properly conform in the main to such as regulate the conduct of successful private business.

What large financial, commercial, or manufacturing institution in this country would select its employees by an educational test, or apply the civil service reform theories in its private business?

Every business institution selects, or permits the heads of its departments to select its employees after a personal examination of the applicant and a careful investigation of his ability and character. But the affairs of this nation, unparalleled in detail and importance, must be intrusted to a privileged class, selected by a lot of irresponsible clerks from academic examinations, without any knowledge of the personal character, habits, or integrity of the applicants.

The worthlessness of this examination is apparent to anyone who will take the trouble to investigate the records of the Civil Service Commission and the misdeeds of its appointees. Not long ago, in my own State, a young graduate from the high school was certified by the civil-service board and appointed to a position in the post-office at Ann Arbor, Mich. To-day he is serving his time as a post-office thief in prison.

Mark my words, the methods of this board are such that they are compelled to employ detectives to prevent crime on the part of their own employees. Fraudulent examinations have taken place in my own city under the Administration of that exalted apostle of civil-service reform, President Cleveland, conducted by his own employees. In one instance the representative of the Board of Civil Service Commissioners in my district, in the customs office, was found guilty of collusion with applicants for positions at the time of the examination, and because of that collusion the examination papers were refused upon investigation by the Civil Service Commission.

Upon another occasion, at a civil-service examination in the post-office in my city, the representative of this holy board was guilty of changing the examination papers of his Democratic friends after they had been completed by the applicants before they were sent to the commission, and the commission, discovering these defects and this fraud, set aside the examination. But what did they do? They ordered another examination, and at that examination they permitted the very men who were thus detected in crime to be examined and certified to the eligible list, and to-day they are holding public office through the grace and power of this most potent commission.

They had to remove both of their secretaries in my city in these two branches of the Government because of their fraudulent conduct, and they retained in the customs office one honest old Republican patriot and made him secretary of the Civil Service Commission in order to prevent fraud in the future. And in the post-office branch they removed a Democrat and appointed a Republican as their representative in order to prevent fraud in the future. But what did they do in reference to the two representatives thus detected in wrongdoing? They are to-day serving in those branches of our Government as though they had never committed an offense against the Government. I believe them both to be honorable men. They simply regarded this law as all of the American people who know anything about its administration regard it, as a monumental humbug. [Laughter.]

When President Cleveland took the office in 1892 the retiring President left all of the officers in the custom-house of my city whose salaries were over $900 a year, and also the deputy and cashier, outside of the civil service, and left all the offices in the internal-revenue office outside of the civil service. He also left out about twenty important positions in the post-office branch. When this apostle of civil-service reform came into office, what did he do? He appointed a collector of the port of the city of Detroit, and the Civil Service Board permitted him not only to fill all the positions not in the classified list, but he deliberately took Republicans drawing $900 a year and more and reduced their salaries to $850 a year, taking them out of the classified list, and then cutting off their heads and filling their places with good, loyal, true Democrats, whose salaries were then increased to over $900 a year, and thus proving the civil-service system to be the humbug that it is; and this was permitted with the knowledge of the Civil Service Board.

Why did they not cry out to the American people and declare against such methods—more iniquitous, more detrimental than the worst form of the spoils system ever heard of? Let me say to you, sir, that of the men who were thus smuggled into the service not to exceed 10 per cent of them could possibly have gotten into the service through this most holy civil-service branch of our Government had they been forced to take this examination. Why, when President Cleveland issued his famous order transferring them into the civil service, when they were thus smuggled in through the derangement of their salaries, did not the commission demand an examination of these employees of the Government?

Now, it is claimed that in order to protect the heads of the Departments in the execution of their business it is necessary that the deputies and cashiers should not be included, and they are not included. In the great post-offices of this country the deputy and cashier are not included in the classified list. Now, the cashier in any one of these post-offices handles about one-tenth as much cash as is handled in the money-order and registered-letter departments, and the opportunity for stealing is ten times greater in the money-order or register department than in the cashier's office. Why should one be in the classified service and the other out, if the principle is just and right and proper?

Under the rules of this department they examine a lot of applicants, for example, for positions in the post-office at Detroit. They certify them into the classified list, and under the rules of the Post-Office Department a list is pasted on the wall, showing all the eligibles—men who have passed the civil-service examination and are waiting patiently to receive their reward. Why, if this principle is right, should not this board permit the heads of the Departments, who know the personal character and habits of the applicants, to select any man on that list who is best qualified for the public service and put him to work? Everyone of them has submitted to the behests of this organization.

They have simply to be examined and be certified, and they are put on the eligible list; and it makes no difference whether they pass at 85 or 90 per cent, if a man is once certified he is qualified when his turn comes. Why hold this power so this octopus can dictate to the heads of Departments? Why not allow the postmaster of the city of Detroit to select anyone on the list and put him to work? No; they demand that the postmaster shall select one of the three at the top. In the city of Detroit recently there were 7 letter carriers to be appointed. While there were 150 on the list, only about 20 could possibly be considered under the rule; and among them, let me say to you, was a man who had been charged with a crime, and when the postmaster passed his name, the Civil Service Commission called a halt. When the postmaster at Detroit assumed his office and gave his bond of $300,000 for the faithful performance of his duty and the safe custody of the money and property in his charge, he found three watchmen in charge of the building, one of whom he did not wish to retain. He discharged him, and he certified to the Postmaster-General that in his judgment it was not safe to intrust the property to the care and custody of that man.

This holy Civil Service Board declared that the postmaster at Detroit had removed this man without authority of the board. They say that that was not sufficient cause for removal. Think of it! A man who has given $300,000 bond for the faithful performance of his duty has a subordinate whom he is not permitted to remove. A watchman's only qualification is his honesty and integrity of character, and can that be ascertained by a board who only applies the test of an academic examination?

The Constitution of our country wisely provided that the President of the United States, Cabinet officers, members of Congress, and every office filled by the Executive, save the judiciary, should have a fixed tenure of office. If it is wise to keep the clerks and subordinates in office for life because, forsooth, the experience makes them better qualified to perform a public duty, why not extend the tenure of the President, Senators, and Members of Congress, and every appointive officer for life and establish the balance of a monarchy in this country? They are better qualified by their experience. In my judgment no man should hold office except for a fixed term. He should have to submit to the people the fidelity of his service before he shall be continued in office, and that is a proper principle in a republican form of government.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] says that this law was created to prevent Senators and Members of the House from importuning, pressing, forcing the heads of Departments to take incompetent men and retain them in office. From what standard does this gentleman judge? From his own? "Judge not, that ye be not judged." Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] undertake to force an incompetent man on any of the heads of Departments? Has he any right to assume that any other member of this House will do so? He said it was created and born for the purpose of destroying the evil effects of the "spoils system."

In my judgment this law was conceived by some genius in a monarchical form of government for the protection of the king and ministry against the wrath of the people, where patronage is always distributed with special favor to a privileged class.

Mr. PEARSON. If the gentleman will allow me, has he looked into the real origin of this law?

Mr. CORLISS. Sufficient to know.

Mr. PEARSON. Is it not of Chinese origin?

Mr. CORLISS. God knows; I can not tell. [Laughter.] It seems, according to Senator Ingalls, to have grown up here, to have been born without parentage, an illegitimate offspring, and I am inclined to agree with him.

Already the Secretary of the Treasury has found it necessary, in order to properly discharge the public business, to virtually pension some of the old employees; and if this law is allowed to stand here in its present form a civil service pension roll will have to be created. Such men have become worthless, like many others, and they will continue to grow in number.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CORLISS. Just a few moments—five minutes.

Mr. HEPBURN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended, or, if I can be recognized, I will yield five minutes to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CORLISS. If this law is to continue, the establishment of a civil service pension roll is inevitable. Already we find men asking, begging to be retained in office when their services are absolutely valueless. The gentleman from Indiana said the members of this House would be tormented by applicants for office. I want to say to you that the only people who have pestered me since I have been in Congress are the men in office who want to be promoted in the civil service.

Any patriotic citizen not in office, when denied the privilege of appointment because another man equally worthy is preferred, recognizes that preference in political life. The only men I am tormented with are those in office to-day who want their positions benefited by promotion.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I agree with the position taken by Congressman Baker, of New Hampshire, on this floor in the Fifty-fourth Congress. He called attention to the fact that under the Constitution of our country the heads of Departments are clothed with the power of appointment.

If that is true, and the matter never has been tested, if heads of Departments are clothed with constitutional power of appointment of their subordinates, what right has Congress to delegate to the Civil Service Board the power to select two or three applicants and certify them up there for appointment? Is it not a destruction of the constitutional power? In my judgment this law to the extent that it has been extended is unconstitutional, and it would be so declared by any court of competent jurisdiction.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let us either modify this law by establishing a fixed tenure of office with rules and regulations that may be safely applied to a successful business enterprise and limit its extensions to future acts of Congress, or should the grasp of the tentacles of this monopoly of public service be too deeply set in the treasury of the people to permit of a reasonable control, then let us destroy the un-American octopus by repealing the act. [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, we have wandered a long way from legitimate debate upon the question before the House, but as there has been so much misapprehension in the country about the so-called civil service, it appears to me that the time has not been wasted. I undertake to say that there is less of accurate information in the country at large upon this subject than upon any other public question.

There is a misapprehension abroad that we have a system known as the merit system by which great improvements in the public service have been secured; that there is a diminution of expenditure; that there is a greater measure of faithful attention to business; that there is a purer class of men in office than at any other period of the country's history. It is to challenge this general impression that I desire to make some remarks. The proponent of a question who has the power to fix the epithets and the designations that may environ it always has a great advantage in debate.

The gentlemen who claim to be the sponsors for purer civil service in this country have been early in taking this advantage. They have environed their side of the question with all the ideas that are suggested when you talk of improvement, of merit, and they have early attributed to their opponents the unkindly epithet of "spoilsmen," "spoils seekers," "those who are striving to secure for themselves undue advantage at the expense of the public weal." It is from this view of the subject mainly, so constantly and earnestly insisted upon by these gentlemen, that the public has secured their ideas of our present civil service.

This system that we have is called the "merit system," and it is assumed that every man who is not in favor of its continuance is in favor of some kind of a system that does not have merit. I deny this. It is assumed that gentlemen who are not in favor of this system are absolutely dishonest in their advocacy, and are selfish spoilsmen, who, as I said, are trying to secure advantage for themselves at the expense of the public good. Is this system that we have the merit system?

If it is properly named, Mr. Chairman, then it must be true that in its method of selection of public officers there must be "merit," and in the persons selected there must be greater "merit." In the result secured there must be greater "merit" as compared with some other system. Now, is this true? Are the methods, the manner of selection, better than those in vogue at an earlier day? You will remember, Mr. Chairman, that for one hundred years we had that system that I will denominate the other system.

During that hundred years there was progress made in this country by our people that excited the wonder of the world. Nowhere else can you find a like example of progress. Where was there any lack of efficiency in the service? Was not every duty performed? Were there not the means of correcting every abuse? What is the method of selection now? It is that of competitive examination. Here are three gentlemen in the city of Washington—the Civil Service Commission—who conduct these examinations.

Do they do it themselves? Have we any benefit resulting from the superiority of these three gentlemen in making these selections? Surely not. On the contrary, they formulate a series of questions, they then put these into the hands of a subordinate, they send him, we will say, to the city of Des Moines twice a year to conduct the examination of persons who aspire to a place in the public service. The only function of this man is to distribute this series of questions among the applicants and allow them to answer them, and then gather up the papers and bring them to the city of Washington, where a certain other class of subordinates mark the rate and the weight of the answers.

That is the method. These gentlemen attempt to ascertain the scholastic qualifications of the applicant only. Is that all that is necessary? Is that all that is to be considered when you are determining between applicants for office as to their worth and fitness? What can they know of the morals of that applicant? What of the industry of the applicant, of the persistent application that he will bring to the discharge of his duties?

Do they know anything about his physical condition or the state of his health that may be necessary to complete efficiency? No; they are absolutely without knowledge of what is necessary in this regard. When an office is to be filled, a requisition is made upon the commission and they send up to the officer making the requisition the names of the three applicants who have made the highest percentage in the competitive examination.

He can simply tell that this one has a certain percentage, that one a certain other percentage, and a third another percentage. Thus in the dark, without a possibility of enlightenment, he makes his selection of one or the other of the three; or, if he fails to do that, these gentlemen now insist that he must make to the commission an assignment of reasons satisfactory to them before he can have three other persons certified from whom he may again attempt a selection.

Now, that is the method adopted. Do you call that "merit?" What is the "merit" to be found in that? Contrast it with the old method—the worst phases of the old methed—and, in my humble judgment, the old was better than the new. Under that, as is said, the appointments were made through persons who had influence at the Departments and at the Executive office. It was through their solicitation and recommendation, it is said, all of the places were filled. I do not believe that to be true.

But assuming it to be true, I say that my colleagues in this House know more about the qualifications of their constituents—know more of the requisites that an officer ought to have, have more at stake in making their recommendations, knowing that the transaction is public and in the face of the world; that their constituents will know if they resort to unworthy methods or consent to the employment in the public service of unworthy men; that they will be held responsible for that as they are held responsible for every other official act—than the commission can possibly know. I believe that there will be greater probity of action, greater beneficence of result, following such a method of selection than under the darkened, subterranean, irresponsible methods that we have fallen into in these later times.

Who is there competent to speak that can say, or does say, that there has been improvement in the civil service? If you appeal to the subordinate officers who are under the cover of civil service—who are beneficiaries of the civil service; who are hoping for a life tenure through the civil service—you will have at once a chorus of acclaim for the system which we now have, and they will undoubtedly laud it as the "merit system." Go to the heads of the Departments. I do not choose to speak names, but everybody within the sound of my voice can bear me out when I say that many of these gentlemen at least are absolutely incompetent to speak when they say that the system of to-day is better than the system that existed prior to 1883.

In order that their testimony should be valuable, they must have knowledge with regard to the conditions of both eras. Can you not select in your minds nearly half a dozen of the eight Cabinet officers who upon this question (no matter how familiar they may be with the service of to-day) have no knowledge of the service in the other era? They know nothing about that with relation to which they assume to institute comparisons. In order that their statements should be of value, they must have been as familiar with the service prior to 1883 as they are with the service of to-day. I believe that every one of you who has had an opportunity for observation—every one of the older members of this House who has been familiar with Washington for years—will say that in his judgment there is no improvement, but a positive retrograde in the manner in which the public service is conducted.

Why, sir, it is in the nature of things that it should be so. There is nothing so conducive to sloth, indolence, inattention to duties, as that feeling of security that comes to men through the civil service. I believe there is no better incentive, no more efficient whip or spur to proper official conduct on the part of the great majority of the members of this House, than the fact that every two years they must appear before their constituents for a renewed lease of power. No one of you gentlemen—perhaps I ought to except two or three, but I was about to say no one of you gentlemen—could be trusted implicitly that at all times and in all places you would be diligent and vigilant in the discharge of duty if you knew that you were to remain in your places unassailed and unassailable during your natural lives. So that I have a right, upon facts observable by all men as incident to human nature, to say that the change of tenure to a life tenure works to the disadvantage of the public.

Now, there must be some compensating advantage, some controlling proof, I will say, to change this opinion that I have. What is it? Has any such proof been offered? These gentlemen have contented themselves with calling this the "merit system"—with saying that this was an improvement. Where is the proof? Do you find it in reduced expenditure? I have failed to observe it. I have not made the examination myself, but I am told by a gentleman who I think has given the matter careful attention that in 1883 the total salary expenditure of the United States was $60,000,000 in round numbers, and that now it reaches nearly $100,000,000 annually. That is to say, while there has been a growth in population of 34 per cent and in public business of less than that, there has been a growth in public expenditure for salaries of 66⅔ per cent.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that the men who have been selected under this system are superior to those who were selected under the prior system. What is the class of men selected? They are the men freshest from their schoolbooks—it is not even the better class of these who are willing to risk the chances of preferment in the professions or in active business, but those who, after having been graduated, are content to accept a $900 or $1,000 clerkship.

It is not the best type of our young manhood. Often it is the schoolmaster, a most worthy class, but usually the country schoolmaster. Not those who can take charge of our great institutions and seminaries of learning, but those who linger about the suburbs of the towns and conduct the country schools, at salaries ranging from forty, thirty-five, or thirty dollars a month even. That is the class of men you are getting, in the main—men in whom perhaps the faculty of memory alone has been cultivated. Occasionally there is an exception. It may be possible that a man may pass the examination and secure the necessary 75 per cent under the rules. But that is absolutely valueless to him. You must remember that there are 55,000 now on the eligible list, and among that number there are many ranging away up to 95, 96, or 97 per cent, so many, indeed, as to preclude the possibility of the appointment of the great multitude of men who think they have successfully passed the examination when they get a percentage of 75 or 80.

So, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the system we have to-day is better. I do not believe that the personnel of the employees secured according to the present method is better. I have no shade of evidence presented to me that the results achieved under this system are better, or that the affairs of the Government are conducted with more precision and more regularity or greater honesty and economy under this so-called merit system than before.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that it is essential to the highest efficiency of the public service in these appointive offices that the power of appointment as well as the power of removal shall be in the same hands, and that it should be practically unlimited. I believe that the widest right of selection should be given. Let us look at it for a moment. There is not an officer, there is not a clerk or a subordinate, in any one of these Departments of the Government who may not have it in his power, in some slight degree at least, and at times, to affect on some occasion the efficiency of the administration of that Department.

There are a great many men whose active help and concurrence with what is being done is necessary and must be secured in order to have the greatest possible degree of efficiency. I think, therefore, that the officer who has the responsibility of the management of one of the great Departments of the Government has the right—he should have the right—to demand the best endeavors of those in his employ, and that class of endeavor can only come from the completest sympathy on the part of all of those who are his instrumentalities and tools for the prosecution of the work committed to him.

I think it better that he should have the power to gather his friends about him. When the people of this country have remitted the conduct of public affairs to the Democratic party I am content that they shall have the power to use all of their ability in making the best possible administration of public affairs. I am content that they should select from the highest to the lowest all the instrumentalities that are to aid them; and when the Republican party has been appointed to the duties, the powers, and the responsibilities of administration, I insist that it should likewise have the right, the unlimited right, of selecting its agents and its agencies, those that will best help to secure the best possible administration of the Government.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, of very many clerical positions where the sympathy and full concurrence on the part of the subordinates with the purposes of the principal may not be of value in the performance of his public duty. Therefore, I believe that the principal should have that power of selection. I would not have it that the "ward heeler," the "political bummer," or men of that class, should be rewarded. I do not believe that it ever has been done.

There may be exceptions where a member of Congress, who had the power or the influence to secure appointment, may have forgotten his duty and attempted to put personal friends in place for an unworthy purpose; but I think the instances, if any exist, must be exceedingly rare. There is no man within the sound of my voice that thinks so illy of one of his colleagues as to believe that he would thus prostitute the power that he has as a member of Congress to these unworthy ends. I do not believe it. The Representative that would do that would meet the condemnation of his people at home and his associates on this floor.

Hence it is not the ward bummer or the political heeler that he wants to reward. It is the faithful friend of himself and of his party who has a laudable ambition to participate in some way, humble though it may be, in the administration of his Government. The men that would come into place from my own region would not be the men who are moved solely by the passion for money, but those who have a desire—almost all men have a desire—of in some way or another connecting themselves with the affairs of their Government.

And, Mr. Chairman, when one of these humble men desires to be a deputy marshal, let us assume, it is human nature that that desire should be as urgent in him as your desire to represent a district upon the floor of this House or that of any other gentleman who may aspire to be President of the United States. These desires are worthy and commendable in men. What would you think if there was some barrier, unknown to the Constitution, that should unfairly be placed in your way, notwithstanding your worth or your fitness?

I have seen some performances on the floor of the House that to my mind did not elevate the manhood or the character of those who played the part.

I have heard gentlemen here declaiming against the "hordes of hungry office seekers that infest the corridors of the Capitol and surge against the walls and porticos of the White House." Ah, did those gentlemen so characterize their constituents and friends eighteen months ago? I remember one notable case where a gentleman left his seat in this House, forsook his official duties, and spent weeks and perhaps months, two months at least, in a canvass from house to house and from village to village begging these same men to stand for him [applause], begging these same men to aid in his nomination as a candidate for Congress, telling them of the perils ahead in case they faltered in their duty and failed to stand true to him and the G. O. P. [Laughter.]

Are not the worthy men who responded to that appeal entitled to recognition? I say that every man in the United States who has qualifications to properly fill an office has the right to aspire to it, and I condemn the men who, forgetful of old relations, denounce their own constituents, the voters of this country, whenever any of them seek that public employment to which every citizen ought to have the right to aspire.

Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that this frank declaration of my belief on this subject will place me, in the minds of some of our friends, in the list of spoilsmen.

I would define a spoilsman to be one who, disregardful of duty, careless of the public service, recognizing only the fact that he has a personal debt to pay, uses public office for the payment of that private debt, although he knows that robbery or inefficient service to the Government will result. That is my idea of a spoilsman, and so I feel some little irritation when gentlemen with such lavish hand throw these accusations around. I am no more a spoilsman than some of the gentlemen who most loudly disclaim against the views that I entertain.

I hope I stand as fair before my constituents and this House and the public as these gentlemen who have been most vituperative in their abuse of such as I. I have no improper designs upon the Treasury of my Government. I want to see the best public service. I want to see the best results attainable, and I believe that one method of attaining the best possible results in this Government is through the maintenance of well-organized political parties. [Applause.] This will always be a government of parties.

We talk about Administrations—about "the Cleveland Administration," about "the Hayes Administration," about "the Jackson Administration"—but they have always been the Administrations of parties. It is the party that is responsible. It is the party that suffers punishment, if punishment is meted out. It is the party that is rewarded, if the people distribute reward. It is the party always; and that party is best, that party can be most beneficent, that party can work the greatest degree of public benefit when it is most stable in its organization.

You can not have political organization unless you have some kind of rewards. It may be that this statement will grate upon the sensitive ears of some of our transcendental friends, but I am talking to practical men about a practical question. You can not have it. Talk as much as you please about the duty of men, about the patriotic impulses of men, but in the great mass of men those motives will not always operate. In times of great peril, as in the last campaign, perhaps they will; but look at your municipal elections and tell me why it is that there is so much corruption in the cities.

It is because the political organizations are not stable, are not well organized, are not efficient. Those gentlemen who call themselves or who are called the better class, the men of wealth, the men of business, stay away from the polls. They do not attend to their political duties, and the professional politician comes in and takes as his rake-off everything in sight. But, Mr. Chairman, it is not an argument against proper party organization; it is an argument in favor of it.

If the people of the United States who have political views would align themselves in parties in accordance with their views, it would tend to the true interests of the country and there would be none of this trouble of which so much complaint is made. I have said that you have to have some kind of reward, because a political organization must have a base as well as an apex. It must have its lower strata as well as its higher. It must have its organizers here, and here, and here, from the bottom to the top. Why do you want to discard the men who are so necessary—the men who watch the polls, the men who are the party leaders in their several localities, the men who, in my part of the country, keep the tallies and take their teams and bring in the voters on election day, the men who make the organization possible and effective? Why ignore them?

As to their ambition to serve their Government, it is a laudable one. But, Mr. Chairman, even if you do away with that possibility, if you continue the service as you have it now, you will still have organization, you will have men at the base attending to the same fundamental duties, but they will be a different class of men and animated by different motives, not by a laudable ambition to serve the country, but by a desire for money. Every year—I challenge contradiction of this statement—every year that this civil-service law has been extended in its operation—every Presidential year, I mean—the campaign funds of the parties have doubled.

You must still depend upon organization, but you will have a class of men who, instead of being animated by laudable ambitions, will be governed by sordid ones. Who will contribute the money to your campaign fund? It will be contributed by the great corporations and the men of colossal wealth. You will simply change the allegiance of the men who organize the parties all over the country from public service to private ends, and as you go along with this system, instead of getting better service, in ten years or twenty years from this time you will have a Government of rich men, and rich men alone. [Applause.]

The organization will look to them. It will be so in both political parties. I do not want that time to come. Oh, I know that gentlemen will declaim against this idea, and talk about its sordidness, and the insult that is thrown to men engaged in party organization. They will talk about the low plane of political morals on which I walk! Ah, gentlemen, I notice that those who have most to say about spoilsmen are in their districts intrenched behind 12,000, 13,000, 14,000, 16,000 of majority. [Applause.] And again, do not these gentlemen use proper political means to secure political success?

I am not quarreling with them; I am simply insisting that I shall not be denounced for a desire to perpetuate that kind of political organization under which this nation has thriven so well. I believe it is right. I want to have an opportunity, if I can, to help the laudable ambition of that constituent of mine who desires to share in the public service. I do not want him to be compelled to spend $15 to go to the capital of my State and undergo an examination and then to be placed upon a list where there are already 55,000, and take his chances, where the requisitions of fourteen years for this class of service have been but little more than a total of 6,000. The most of my constituents can not last one hundred and ten years, as they would have to if they went on the eligible list to-day. [Laughter.]

Mr. FARIS. Before the year was out 55,000 more would be added.

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not want them to go there another time. I think this item of expense is a matter that might be considered. We have found already that the Civil Service Commission in its expenditures grows wonderfully. Eleven thousand dollars, if I mistake not, was the total of expenditure for that body in 1884. What is it now?

They have an adroit way of covering some large portion of the expenditure, but I think that gentlemen on the Committee on Appropriations will bear me out in saying that it is at least a quarter of a million dollars for the next fiscal year, and has been that during the last. Add that to the cost to the 55,000 individuals now on the eligible list—to say nothing of those who have failed—how large that number is I do not know, but if approximately half, there are a hundred thousand people that have gone to different places for purposes of examination. That cost them, in my judgment, more than a million of dollars. Thrown away! I think we had better quit the system. It is too expensive for the result that comes.

Mr. Chairman, if you have read the testimony taken before the subcommittee on appropriations delivered by some one of the three commissioners, I think you must have found something to excite your risibles. These gentlemen were there, among other purposes, to secure an appropriation for a $1,600 clerk that they wanted as a "law clerk;" and the statement was made that no one of the commissioners was a lawyer. No one of them has any knowledge of the science of law; and yet I find here in this synopsis showing the character of examinations: "Assistant attorney of the Interior Department." One of those assistant attorneys I know. He is an eminent lawyer. He is a good lawyer. When he wanted a promotion he had to be examined by these men, no one of whom was a lawyer, and who wanted a $1,600 clerk to examine him. [Laughter.] Here in this synopsis I read:

ASSISTANT ATTORNEY, INTERIOR DEPARTMENT (OFFICE OF ASSISTANT ATTORNEY-GENERAL).

Subjects.	Weights.
	Per cent.
1. General law (10 questions)	20
2. Public-land laws (30 questions, including homestead, mining, preemption, timber-culture, town-site, swamp-land, school-land, and railroad-grant laws)	60
3. Experience: Questions to call forth competitor's experience in the application and administration of public-land laws especially	20

Now, these gentlemen who declaim so lustily about your fitness and my fitness to recommend a proper person to be appointed assistant attorney do not hesitate to arrogate to themselves the power and competency—no one of them being a lawyer—to examine this gentleman that I have referred to, and that, too, upon the intricate questions respecting which so many of the lawyers here would not be informed—the land laws, the railroad-grant laws, and all that class of laws that require special training. What is the examination of these three persons worth?

Suppose they are as honest as they can be. Suppose they have all of that purity that they say we and the heads of Departments have not. What would the examination be worth? What would their marking be worth? How could they weigh the value of an answer that A would make against that which B would make in ascertaining the weight per cent? To my mind, the whole subject is simply one for ridicule. At the very best, they could only advise the officer of the scholastic attainments of the applicant. They lose sight of and leave out of the question every other qualification for appointment.

But how do we know that they are pure? How do they know, when this examination is made under the eye of a subordinate clerk 1,500 miles from the commission, that there is not collusion between those who are applicants and who are undergoing examination and this subordinate, and how can they know that men are not coached in order that they may get a large percentage? How do they know that these papers are not doctored after they leave the hands of the applicant, and favoritism shown? It is true we have no evidence that this is so; but when the charge of incapacity and corruption is made against members of this House who have been indorsed by their constituents as honest men, why may we not be suspicious with regard to these Civil Service Commissioners and their subordinates, who have never received the indorsement of anybody?

Here the other day it was shown that a man who many members of this House said was unfit to be in any official position, from the record he himself had made, had been transferred to the civil-service department, and with all his crimes upon his head, red handed in his abuse of the civil service, was sitting there, the chosen agent of that body, in judgment upon other people; probably writing the reports which criticise the capacity, the integrity, and fitness of members of Congress and heads of Departments in making appointments.

Mr. Chairman, if I had the power to write a civil-service law I would give the appointing power to the heads of Departments. I would require that appointments should be probationary, and that after a service of three or six months and a successful examination by the Department, or by the commission, if the office required scientific knowledge, the examination being limited to ascertaining the fitness of the applicant to discharge the duties of the office to which he aspired, I would give him a commission for a stated period, but reserving the power of removal to the appointing officer for any cause—save a political one—that he regarded sufficient.

But I would require him when making a removal to state in writing the cause or causes, which should be filed in his office as a public record. I know of no way in which a better service can be had. I do believe, as firmly as I believe in my own existence, that the worst conceivable service is that which we have to-day. I do not think that a life tenure of office can promote the zeal or efficiency of an officer. But, you say, there will be no life tenure and no civil-service pension. Gentlemen, in the theory of your law that may be so, but the law must be administered by human agencies, by men who have affections, by men who have sympathies, men of kindliness, men who will not turn decrepid old age into the streets to starve.

It may be an official duty that a man should thus deport himself, but I hope, even if that is so, that duty will never be performed by an American citizen. [Applause.] I do not know that it is a duty. Men are selected to perform official functions because they are men, because they have these attributes as well as other qualities; because they have affections and sympathies, and because they can not be barbarians. I am not sure that it is a political duty that the law or the lawmakers expect to be performed. An officer can not now remove an inefficient person without charges are preferred and shown to him. Why shown to him? In order that he may make defense, else the requirement means nothing. Make defense? That means an issue; that means a trial; that means witnesses.

How are you going to get that machinery into operation? Here are a dozen men in the same division; they have been there for years; they all stand upon the same basis, the same tenure, which they want to have maintained. They have been friends for years. Their families are friends. Their children go to the same schools. They belong to the same churches. They have the same community of interest.

Will the chief of that division prefer charges against one of his subordinates, one of his friends, unless he is compelled to do it? And when proof of the charges is sought will the other associates and friends of ten or twenty years' standing come up as witnesses against the man? It is expecting too much. It will not be done. That part of your system will fall into disuse; there will be life tenure of office, and, as a necessity, there will be a civil-service pension roll without additional legislation. [Loud applause.]

Mr. CLARKE of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, if I were but to consult my own wishes in the premises, I should be content to listen to this debate upon the subject of the civil service, especially after listening to the able and convincing argument of the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] who has just preceded me. But the fact that the subject has come to be so prominent of late and is so important to the people of the country in general and to the Republican party in particular reminds me that it is not only my duty to take an open stand upon this question, but that I ought also to state, though briefly and imperfectly as I must in the short time allotted to me, some of the reasons that actuate me. I have noticed with regret a spirit of intolerance manifested on the part of some gentlemen toward others here who do not agree with them on this question.

For my part, I concede honesty of purpose to every gentleman who has preceded me, and I expect the same treatment in return. I am in favor of a civil-service system. There is probably no gentleman on this floor who is more in favor of it than I am, and I wish that to be understood now and for all time. But, Mr. Chairman, it must be an honest system; it must be a reasonable one, a practical one; and if the committee having this subject in charge shall happily present to us such a measure, I will give it my earnest and loyal support. I am opposed to the present system, as I am opposed to dishonesty, hypocrisy, and dissembling everywhere.

If it be true that thousands of people were appointed to office under the Administration of Grover Cleveland and that an equal number of faithful officials, many of them veteran Union soldiers, were degraded and discharged from office in order to accomplish that end, then I believe it to be our duty to pause right here, strike at the root of that evil, and undertake immediately to right those wrongs. And our duty to these unfortunate people, our country, and ourselves will never have been performed until this tardy justice has been meted out to them. Having started honestly, I would provide that it shall not be possible for any Executive, any Secretary of the Treasury or his son, any Secretary of the Interior or his son, or any other father's son, seeking cheap notoriety, to come here and juggle with the provisions of the law, openly defy its mandates, and thus in an indecent manner thwart the will of the people.

But it is said that this reform can not be accomplished because of the action of the Republican party upon the subject at its convention in St. Louis. Well, let us see how we stand upon this issue? Is it to be held that wrongs may not be righted under this Government whenever and wherever they may be found—that justice may not be substituted for injustice? Mr. Chairman, when did such pernicious doctrine as this first obtain under the most magnificent Government under the sun—that one of its citizens, however humble or lowly he might be, who had faithfully supported its principles and heroically defended its flag, should be ignominiously dismissed from public station at the behest of any political party? Sir, no such doctrine as this ever did obtain in this country, and it never will. On the contrary, one of the grandest principles that we have ever been taught to believe, and do believe, is that wherever an American citizen has the right to be in the accomplishment of that which he has the right to do, there he may have the force, the fortunes, and the honor of 70,000,000 people behind him, even as he has it to-day in the frozen Klondike regions of the north and in the land of the midnight sun.

Mr. Chairman, charity not only begins at home, but honesty, justice, and common decency begins there also. If it had been fairly understood that such a state of affairs existed within the very shades of this Capitol—in each and all the Departments of this Government, aye, under the roof of the Executive Mansion itself—no such plank would ever have been permitted to become a part of that platform. But even if this were not so, then I submit that because of certain Executive orders that have been made and promulgated since that platform was adopted, we not only have the right, but it is our duty to examine into this question, and, if it be necessary to reasonably change this law, nobody will deny that it is not only our right, but our duty to change it.

Mr. Chairman, did it ever occur to you that when you went up to the Executive Mansion to say a good word for a friend who was worthy and well qualified, and who had said many good words for you, you were no better than "the forger of a check or the embezzler of a trust fund," as declared by the president of the National Civil-Service League in his recent speech at Cincinnati? How many gentlemen upon the floor of this House have not been to the President or to the head of a Department upon a similar errand, and how many will subscribe to such infamous doctrine?

Ah, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman was right in making those charges against us for attempting to aid a friend in an honest endeavor to serve his country, as we are serving it, and to provide for himself and his family, because of this law, then, sir, I would avoid this law as I would strike down a venomous reptile in order to escape his deathly sting. When the time comes in this country that I must abandon my friends in order to uphold an obnoxious law, with me it will be a parting of the ways. You may stand by the law if you will, but I prefer to stand by the friends who have stood by me. [Applause.]

The same gentleman asks us why we have not favored disbanding the Army every four years and turning over the ships to untried men. That reminds me. Why has not the gentleman in these fourteen long years advocated placing the very flower of the Army and the Navy at West Point and Annapolis under the provisions of this valuable law? I suppose that if this law had been in existence in "the times that tried men's souls," when the fate of the nation was trembling in the balance, this gentleman, in order to be consistent, would have declined to enlist a volunteer soldier until he had first passed a civil-service examination [applause]—until he had defined the meaning of the word "exequatur," named the longest river or the highest mountain in the world, or stated the nearest distance from the Soldiers' Home by public conveyance to the seat of the contending armies. [Applause.] What would Grant and Sherman and Sheridan and Thomas and Hancock and McClellan and a hundred more brave commanders upon both sides have said to such a proposition as this? Abraham Lincoln—God bless his memory!—speak to us to-day from your saintly home and tell us what would have been your reply. Ah, my friends, consistency is indeed a jewel; but, alas! we do not find it in the silken, scented casket of mugwumps. [Applause.]

Recently, in my own State, examinations were held of persons who desired to enter the civil service. Notices were given that those examinations would be held in the city of Concord at a quarter past 10 o'clock in the forenoon of a certain Monday. Not one-half of the applicants could reach that city at that hour without either traveling upon Sunday or going the Saturday before, at an expense that they could not well afford, because they were poor. A young man asked me whether I thought it would be safe for him to go by a train that reached Concord fifteen minutes after 10. I replied, "I do not know; God only knows what this present Board of Civil Service Commissioners will require of you." I suggested that he write to the commission, making that inquiry; and he did so. They replied, "No; it is necessary for you to be there at precisely the hour named—10 o'clock." Was not that a nice order to emanate from a great bureau of this great Government to the poor boys and girls of this country?

Oh, but some one will say, "This is only a fault of the administration of the law and not of the law itself." That is what they always say when anything of this kind is brought up against the existing system. Mr. Chairman, the system is full of imperfections and impracticable notions, and it never will be made perfect until it is born again, and with it a board of Civil Service Commissioners who will exercise a little common sense. [Renewed applause.]

A short time ago I received a letter from a gentleman residing in the district that I have the honor to represent, asking me if I would send him a few garden seeds, provided he did not have to come to Washington and take a civil-service examination in order to receive them. No wonder my friend did not wish to sow garden seeds alongside of such civil-service seeds as we are receiving under the law as now administered, seeds that are not indigenous to American soil.

The best test of a law is to ascertain what the public thinks of it, what they say of it, whether it is popular or unpopular. Let us see what one of its friends said of this law on the 15th day of December last in the upper branch of Congress. I quote from the speech of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. LODGE:

> I am quite aware, Mr. President, that just at this stage of existence it is not fashionable to say anything in behalf of the civil-service system as it exists under the law of 1883.

Surely if this law was right it would be popular. If it is wrong it is unpopular, of course. You and I may be wrong upon some of the great public questions of the day, but the people are always right. Why is this law unfashionable? It is because the common sense, the manhood, the womanhood, the patriotic impulse of the people is for fair play and a square deal, and that they have not had under this law, and no one who values his judgment even pretends it.

Is it fair to discharge a veteran Union soldier who fought to preserve this Union, and who did preserve it, and supplant him by men who would have destroyed it? Is it fair to degrade a man who was shot through the lungs in that terrible conflict and give his place to a man who never smelt powder in his life and who does not know what the word "patriotism" means, and then to cover the latter by the cloak of civil-service reform by Executive order? No, Mr. Chairman, a thousand times no; and until such wrongs have been righted I am unalterably opposed to the law as at present administered.

Only a short time ago we witnessed the spectacle of 50,000 people, most of them poor, undertaking to pass the civil-service examination, at an expense to themselves of more than $500,000. And for what? Will somebody be kind enough to tell me? Not that they might, if successful, take up office under the Government, for every office was filled and filled for life; but that they might have the supreme satisfaction of knowing that they were being "borne on the rolls" as candidates for office for the term of one year [laughter] and of saying to their friends, "But the office that I looked for never came."

And we are asked by this bill to appropriate substantially $125,000 that this farce may be continued; that this Board of Civil Service Commissioners may be continued; that they in another twelve months may issue a similar order to 50,000 more people—men and women of this country, American citizens—dooming them to disappointment and despair. [Applause.]

Ah, but they say—and the question has been asked half a dozen times or more upon this floor—"What kind of a law would you give us?" On this question I am a good deal like the man who kept a bird store, and who was called upon one day by a man who wanted to purchase a parrot—a man who stuttered badly. He asked him, "D-d-d-do you keep p-p-p-parrots?" The storekeeper responded that he did, and showed him some, from which he made selection. He then asked, "Can this one t-t-t-talk?" "Well," said the storekeeper, "if he couldn't talk better than you can I would kill him." [Laughter and applause.]

And so with this law. If it is the best that we have got to offer to the American people, then I am sorry. I am ashamed of it. Give us something that is worthy of the broad intelligence of the men and the women of this country. Give us "any old thing" [laughter] rather than this. [Applause.] But, preferably, Mr. Chairman, give us a law that will do justice to all political parties alike; that will elevate the manhood and the womanhood of the American people; that will meet the approval of the entire country. Give us a law that will remedy the evils that now exist. [Applause.]

As to just what such a law should be I am not so particular. I am willing to leave it to the wisdom, the judgment, and good common sense of the committee having the matter in charge, supplemented by the action of both Houses of Congress. With such a law as I have indicated, we shall be able to continue the splendid Administration of William McKinley, so happily begun. Under it we shall also be able to continue without jeopardy the magnificent principle of the protection of American industries, the preservation of an honest dollar, and the prosperity of the best people on earth. [Applause.]

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE ASHLEY B. WRIGHT.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. ASHLEY B. WRIGHT, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for fitting tributes to his memory.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, do adjourn.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy of the same to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, on the evening of Saturday, August 14, 1897, the people whom I now have the honor to represent were shocked and saddened by the announcement that ASHLEY B. WRIGHT, their honored Representative in Congress, had passed away. Death had come suddenly, the result of an apoplectic shock. Without an instant's warning a strong man had fallen, a life of rare usefulness was ended.

It is hard to understand why such a man should have been taken away. Beloved in his home, relied upon by his business associates, trusted and honored by the people among whom he lived, he could have looked forward to many years of happiness and effective service.

When a man dies at his post, in the midst of a useful career as a member of this House, it is fitting that business should be suspended in order that his brother members may have an opportunity to pay affectionate and sincere tributes to his memory. The plain, unassuming, earnest man whom we honor to-day is worthy of this mark of respect. A kind neighbor, a devoted husband, an honest public servant has gone, but he will live in the memory of the people of his beloved Commonwealth, for as a public man his obligations had been conscientiously performed, and his whole life had been characterized by service for his fellowmen.

ASHLEY BASCOM WRIGHT was born in Hinsdale, Mass., among the Berkshire Hills, on May 25, 1841. He was of New England stock. His father was an early Free Soiler, one of the pioneer Republicans of Massachusetts; a man of sterling integrity, who held to the day of his death the respect of the entire community in which he lived. His mother was a gracious, conscientious woman of true New England type. Theirs was a happy Christian home, and its uplifting and inspiring influence was a controlling factor in the life of our friend.

Mr. WRIGHT was educated in the public schools of Hinsdale and at Lincoln Academy. Upon completing the course at the latter place he secured a position in a mercantile establishment in his native town. He was preeminently a business man, and until his election to Congress was actively engaged in mercantile pursuits. His business career was marked by honesty and thoroughness, the same principles which governed his public life. At the time of his death he was a director of the Adams National Bank of North Adams and a member of the board of investment of the North Adams Savings Bank, to both of which institutions his services were of great value.

In 1862 Mr. WRIGHT went to North Adams, Mass., to accept a position as chief deputy in the internal-revenue office, and from that time until his death was thoroughly identified with the welfare and prosperity of that thriving city. Mr. WRIGHT was a modest, practical, able man—a trained man of affairs, systematic and conscientious in the performance of his duties to a remarkable degree. A successful business man, he never shirked the responsibilities of citizenship. Dr. Munger once said, "Exclusive devotion to the home makes one weak; to business, selfish. A hearty and practical interest in the State alone can make one strong and large." For thirty-five years he was almost constantly employed in some department of public service. He was called by the people from one position to another, his influence becoming constantly greater, his ability keeping step with his opportunity.

His administration of the official positions to which he was chosen at his home was characterized by integrity, careful attention to detail, thoroughness, sound judgment, and common sense. He was always a wise and conservative leader and a safe counselor. In 1884 he was elected county commissioner, in which position he served for three years. In 1888 he became a member of the executive council of Massachusetts, and was reelected to that position in 1889. In 1892 he was elected from the First Massachusetts district a member of the Fifty-third Congress, and was reelected to the Fifty-fourth and Fifty-fifth Congresses. He was serving his third term in this body at the time of his death.

I do not propose to speak of his services as a member of this House; that I shall leave to those who are to follow me. He was not a debater or a parliamentarian, but I am sure that those who served with him here will bear witness to the fact that his ripened judgment and experience, his business capacity, and his sound common sense were of material assistance in carrying on the work of this House—that his influence was on the right side. That he had a place in the hearts of his associates here, I have reason to know. Many members have spoken to me of him not alone with hearty praise for his public work, but with affectionate expression of their own sense of personal loss. Especially touching have been the words of quick and tender sympathy for the sorrowing wife. May God comfort her in this great bereavement.

Mr. WRIGHT was a Republican by inheritance and conviction; he never faltered in the faith, but he was not a bitter partisan. He had the judicial temperament in a high degree and always treated respectfully the views of those from whom he differed. His political successes were not always easy ones. Some of his battles were unusually close and earnestly contested, but he was always cool and kept his head. He kept personalities out of his campaigns, and never sought to advance his own cause by heaping abuse upon an opponent. It was my fortune to be in close touch with him in some of his campaigns, and it is gratifying to be able to say that I never heard him, even in private conversation, speak ill of a political opponent.

I was with him on Thursday before he died. We drove to Bennington, Vt., with a party of gentlemen with whom we had been associated in public work. Never had I seen Mr. WRIGHT in better spirits or apparently in better health. He was bright, companionable, full of courage and hope. It was a happy day—one long to be remembered. Little did I think as I said good-by to him that evening that it was a last good-by. It was the last time I ever saw him. On Saturday he died, sincerely mourned by the people who had so long known and honored him. The funeral services were simple, as he would have had them, and loving hands laid him to rest in the beautiful Berkshire land he loved so well. His work here is finished. The record is made. I have not spoken of him with fulsome eulogy. You who knew him know that he was the last one who would have wished that. I have tried to pay a just tribute to worth and fidelity. ASHLEY B. WRIGHT will not be forgotten. In the years that are to come his memory will be sacredly cherished.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I shall add but a single word to the very just, to the very able and eloquent speech of the honorable gentleman who has just taken his seat, as a tribute to the memory of our late colleague, whose eulogies we pronounce to-day.

Mr. WRIGHT was a typical Massachusetts business man, a class of men exceedingly valuable in the halls of legislation, thoroughly appreciative of the relation of facts to each other, a man who could be relied upon to come to a sound conclusion on all questions that came up in the House. He was always present at the meetings of his committee, where his services were exceptionally valuable. While his voice was seldom heard in debate, his influence for good was far greater than that of many exceptionally able speakers. His service in this House was creditable to himself and to Massachusetts, and his death is felt as a personal bereavement by each member of the delegation.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, ASHLEY B. WRIGHT first came here, as the Representative of the First Massachusetts district, at the extra session in August, 1893. From that time till the close of the session last July I lived at the same hotel and sat, most of the time, at the same table with him.

With such opportunities to know him, it is not surprising that our companionship ripened into a close, mutual friendship, for he was a man whom to know was to love.

His public career in Congress was marked by the faithful and diligent work he did for his constituents. No call was too insignificant to receive his watchful attention. Indeed, I doubt if there be another member on this floor who gave more hours to the special work of his constituents than he did.

He did not take an active part in public debate, though on occasion he could express his views publicly in a clear and forcible way. His natural modesty and retiring disposition led him rather to the field of meditation than to the forum of discussion. He was an excellent listener, and was seldom out of his seat when questions of public concern were under consideration.

In the committee room he was a close student of questions presented and brought to their solution a fair and judicial consideration. Educated largely as a business man, he examined these questions with a business eye. Good, sound judgment was the notable characteristic of his mind. As Lamartine said of Mirabeau, "His genius was the infallibility of good sense." In his relations here with his fellow-members he was a genial, jovial, and welcome associate, respected by all and envied by none.

But the man was best seen and most admired in the closer relations of the social circle—in the after-dinner chats and in the unrestrained freedom of his room, where no arbitrary rules of procedure nor conventional restraints barred approach to that flow of exuberant spirits and that fund of rich anecdote for which he was specially noted among his friends. He had a keen wit and displayed an inexhaustible fund of humor, and every hour spent with him in these informal gatherings was a benediction.

He was absolutely unselfish. He was always thoughtful of others and ever doing something to promote their happiness.

His characteristics were what Wordsworth calls:

> That best portion of a good man's life,—
> His little, nameless, unremembered acts
> Of kindness and of love.

But better than all was Mr. WRIGHT's home life, where he was not merely the head, but, in an especial sense, the idol of his household. Happily married, his home was the abiding place of mutual trust and confidence and the scene of unrestrained joy. Buckle tells us that the characteristics of men are fashioned and shaped largely by the aspects of nature which environ them. If this be true, who will deny that the grandeur and beauty of those far-famed Berkshire Hills, celebrated in song and story, upon which his eye feasted nearly all his life, contributed to that love of nature, that equable temper of mind, that profound spirit of veneration, and that love of the beautiful in nature and in art for which he was noted.

He looked through nature up to nature's God, and became a sincere and devoted Christian in a broad and catholic sense. Identified with a church in his home city, he was never a sectarian. He looked out from the narrow vision of sect upon the wide sea of humanity and saw in every man a brother, whose foibles or failings he might dislike and attempt to correct, but he never assumed to sit in judgment and denounce penalties upon his fellows who differed with him in opinion or stubbornly adhered to the dogmas of an erroneous creed. Because of the broad charity of his heart he could say with Miller:

> In men, whom men condemn as ill,
> I find so much of goodness still;
> In men, whom men pronounce divine,
> I find so much of sin and blot,
> I hesitate to draw the line
> Between the two, when God has not.

In his home city he was the friend of that most numerous element of our population, the plain people; that element that President Lincoln always relied upon in his official life; that element that directs, if it does not originate, public opinion and ultimately determines the public policy of our Government.

Being their friend and holding their confidence, it is not surprising that he was selected as the only available man of his party to wrest his district from the control of his political opponents, as he successfully did at his first election to Congress; and being their friend and holding their confidence, it did not surprise me at his funeral to witness an unusual exhibition of grief as these people gazed for the last time upon that face that had so often beamed with delight whenever he could do them some kind deed or give them some wise counsel. But their friend and my friend has gone. On the 14th of August last, just as the curtains of evening were drawn over those mountains he loved so well and which so aptly typified the lofty grandeur of his manhood and the immovable solidity of his character, with no note of warning—in the twinkling of an eye—the grim monster stealthily entered his happy home, and snatching his spirit bore it away to the God he worshiped and adored. We can not fathom the purposes of the Almighty, and it is well that it is so. But in that sublime Christian faith which our friend possessed we can divine some great good to him that he was called to enjoy, and some great good to us who mourn his loss, that we will some time share.

My humble tribute to his memory finds its source in a sad heart that is swollen with grief at his untimely demise. Others will speak of his virtues and his career from a less partial standpoint, but all who knew him honored and respected him.

Honored citizen, faithful public servant, honest man, trusted friend, pass on. The gates of history are wide ajar to receive thee, and should some jealous sentinel on the outposts demand to know the excellencies of thy life or the graces of thy character, point him to us, who to-day will write them in letters of living light on the tablets of an unfading memory.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Speaker, I come from a State whose people have their own distinctive traits, their own past traditions and history, their own ideals and aspirations. Though proud of our own history, though rejoicing in those qualities of mind and heart which climate and circumstances have developed in our people, yet we feel an equal delight in the glorious history of our common country and entertain a deep admiration for high qualities of character possessed by other sections.

So Virginia rejoices in the proud history of Massachusetts and entertains a profound esteem for the resolute, sterling, persevering, energetic traits of character possessed by the people of that noted

Commonwealth. The wonderful achievements and fame of Massachusetts, and, I might say, of New England, are due not so much to a few illustrious names adorning the pages of her history, but rather to the high qualities of the great mass of her citizens. It was the typical New Englander's passion for liberty that made him resist the British stamp act and oppose British aggression. It was the stubborn courage of the typical New Englander that met British force and wrote in blood some of the brightest pages of American history.

It was the unconquerable perseverance of the New Englander that transferred a bleak and dreary wilderness into great and magnificent Commonwealths. It was their thrift that has made this section one of the most prosperous and wealthy in the world. It was their love of adventure and of enterprise that induced them to seek, in the West and the Northwest, new abodes, to build there States destined soon to rival in power and greatness New England herself.

To be a typical representative of citizens who have accomplished so much where attainments are so high is indeed a proud honor and a high distinction.

Our deceased colleague, Mr. WRIGHT, whose loss we this day mourn, was a genuine and true representative of this high order of New England citizenship. He possessed preeminently these distinctive qualities and virtues. I met him here in this Chamber first, and our acquaintance became more intimate, as we lived for quite a while at the same hotel. My acquaintance with Mr. WRIGHT increased my admiration for those splendid elements that constitute New England citizenship. He possessed a mind strong, vigorous, and liberal. He had a judgment that was careful and sound. He was the very soul of honor and integrity. He had as kindly a heart as ever pulsated in man. He was entertaining, attractive, and made a fast, warm friend. He was a man that one was glad to know, that one could trust implicitly and must admire for his modest, frank, manly character. He was a most useful, efficient, and capable Representative. He had his convictions upon public questions, which he maintained without offense, yet with firmness.

He was a strong Republican, but broad-minded, patriotic, and liberal, devoid of any petty, bitter partisanship. He numbered among his best friends many on this side of the Chamber. His own people bestowed upon him many positions of honor and of trust. He so faithfully discharged every duty that each year witnessed the bestowal upon him of higher honors and responsibilities. His life was one of progression. Massachusetts loses, in Mr. WRIGHT, one of those ideal citizens whose patriotism and deeds have made illustrious that Commonwealth.

Mr. Speaker, Humboldt has well said, "Earth holds up to her Maker no fruit like the finished man."

Thus, in conclusion, I can truthfully say, in the pure, noble life of our deceased colleague the earth has presented her Maker with one of her best offerings.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Speaker, an attempt to express one's feelings on an occasion like this results in failure.

If one performs a perfunctory duty his words are lifeless, and if he feels the keen pangs of regret at the death of the one eulogized then they fail to convey to the hearer or reader the inward emotions of the speaker. I perform no perfunctory duty here to-day, nor can I give adequate expression to those feelings which are struggling in vain for suitable words to convey them to my hearers.

Sorrow and deep regret are among the bitter experiences of life, but they can not be portrayed by words, and it is probably well that it is so, as it is not best that we should bear each other's pain.

In our associations with one another here in this body we rarely form those strong feelings of friendship which characterize home and neighborly associations. Ours is more of a business relation, and knowing as we do that our stay here is somewhat limited, and being slow in forming new relations with others, it almost necessarily follows that our eulogies are a good deal in the formal order and largely lacking in those expressions which arouse the emotional side of our natures.

I would not have my words formal, and I may not make them expressive, but my failure to do so is not because I lack in those ties of warmest friendship which death can painfully sunder.

I knew Mr. WRIGHT well, and my knowledge of him led to the forming of strong ties of friendship for him. My knowledge of him was more than the mere acquaintance formed among members upon this floor. We became acquainted in the early days of the extra session of the Fifty-third Congress, and I trust it will not be thought to show a lack of intelligence on his part or of egotism on mine when I say that that acquaintance ripened into friendship, which continued until his death, and which I am vainly struggling to express here today.

Mr. WRIGHT was not one of those who leave strong impressions at first acquaintance, for his retiring nature gave him the appearance of coldness; and yet it was simply the appearance, for a close acquaintance brought him out in his true light, that of a gentle and honorable man. He possessed wonderfully strong traits of character, but it took intimate association with him to learn how strong they were. His rugged manhood was so softened and subdued with the gentle qualities of his nature that at first knowledge of him he appeared negative and wanting in ruggedness. But he was a man of deep convictions, and he possessed in a quiet way the power to impress others with those convictions. He was not a man of words or much speech, rarely, if ever, attempting to sway minds with lengthy talks or set speeches, and yet he possessed the power of presenting in conversation his ideas and convictions in such clear, consecutive, and logical manner as to show that his was a rare and very strong mind.

He despised the demagogue and hated shams. He believed that political pledges should be redeemed, and that as a public servant he was acting not alone for his constituents, but for his country also. He believed in parties and was a party man, and yet his intense loyalty to party never for one moment swayed him in his friendship for members of other parties; and so it came about that some of his stanchest supporters were members of other political parties. He was most sincerely devoted to his constituents, and by his constituents I mean all the people of his district, for he did not divide them into classes in his estimate of his duty to them. He did not perform one kind of service for the rich and influential and another kind for the poor and humble, but all were alike the objects of his official care.

He never practiced duplicity and he hated sycophancy.

He did not regard his official preferment as elevating him above his neighbors and friends, but he looked upon it as a position which he could honor by being true to himself, his constituents, and his country. Hence duty was his guiding star, and honor in his estimation came alone through the performance of that duty.

These qualities made him conspicuous among those whom he had known from childhood, made him loved and trusted by his neighbors.

To these neighbors and friends his death came as a great calamity, bringing with it a sorrow as deep as the love they bore for the honored dead.

The life of such a man is never lost. It is remembered and copied, not because of its brilliancy, but because of its goodness.

Such a life needs no commemoration in brass or marble, for loving hearts will bear it on to everlasting remembrance.

I learned to admire and love Mr. WRIGHT.

A very close companionship for months enabled me to observe his sterling qualities, to learn of his noble manhood, his unyielding devotion to duty, his very marked tenderness as a husband, and his gentleness which made his presence so very dear. All these impressed me much, and now, when death has come, my sorrow is the deeper for having been impressed by them.

We may not stop to moralize on the future of such a life, but there is something within us, after all, which suggests that such a good and gentle life enters into rest after death.

We can not help but be touched by the idea suggested in the lines upon the monument standing at the grave of John Howard Payne:

> Sure when thy gentle spirit fled
> To realms beyond the azure dome,
> With arms outstretched God's angels said,
> "Welcome to heaven's home, sweet home."

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Speaker, the eloquent words of eulogy which have been spoken here upon our dead friend by the representatives of both political parties and by his colleagues from Massachusetts and from distant States leave nothing to be added, and yet I can not forbear to utter one word expressive of the loss which his Commonwealth has suffered and of the deep sense of bereavement which must come to all who knew him.

No constituency was represented in this body by a more conscientious member than ASHLEY B. WRIGHT. He gave the most painstaking attention to every matter of public business with which he was intrusted. The work that he did was unostentatiously and yet effectively done. His qualities were not of a showy or superficial character. He took none of the time of the House in what is called debate, and what is sometimes unjustly dignified by that term.

But he possessed a fine, solid judgment, which he was able to express to his friends with clearness and force. It was my fortune, during the period of his service, to be for a time intimately associated with him, and I can say that every day of that association added to the esteem and affection with which I came to regard him.

I came to see that the people of the Berkshire district had shown great sense and discernment in selecting their Representative. But the end came suddenly and without warning, at least to us. I have no doubt that a well-spent and blameless life prepared him to receive the summons without fear. He has been snatched from our midst, and while we are deeply touched at the public and our own personal loss, we shall warmly cherish the memory of his high but modest merit, his genial and kindly presence, and of as tender, brave, and generous a heart as ever beat in human breast.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Speaker, I can not forbear to add a word to what has been already so well said in reference to the life and character of our deceased colleague. Living at the same hotel with him the first winter I spent in Washington, I was the recipient of many acts of kindness at his hands, and there grew up between us a personal friendship which lasted while his life endured. Brief as was the existence of this friendship, it was sufficient for a thorough understanding and appreciation of the man.

No one could make any mistake as to the manner of man he was. What he was, what he could and could not do, was an open book. When such a man dies the language of eulogy has very little office. His life has told its own story. His acts and purposes are plain, and at his death his epitaph is already made up. There is really nothing to be said. But the purpose of the ancient custom in accordance with which we are acting to-day must largely be to place upon the record something which strangers may peruse, and gain profit and guidance therefrom.

ASHLEY B. WRIGHT was an unassuming, true man, with practical, sound, and broad attributes of mind that well fitted him to be a public servant. He was so fair and candid that if he could have his way here to-day, nothing would be said of him by another that could not be justly and appropriately said, and my few words shall be spoken as if under his admonition. His chief characteristic, perhaps, was an over-present desire, if not anxiety, to discharge fully and fitly every obligation which he assumed or which was laid upon him. He was constant in his attendance upon the sessions of the House. He was patient and laborious in the investigation of subjects of legislation.

He was no easy-going and careless legislator who accepted the conclusions of others and blindly followed them. He thought for himself, and acted with a keen appreciation of the responsibility which he owed to his country and to his constituents. He was a well-poised man, physically as well as mentally, not to be carried away by excitement or driven to hasty conclusions. Now, these qualities which made him valuable in the councils of the nation had been previously exhibited by him in the service of the Commonwealth from which he came, and they had given him an assured position in the esteem and confidence of the people.

Personally he was a most genial and approachable man, with an equable temperament that was seldom ruffled. He was free from envy, and rejoiced in the success of his colleagues. His ambition was to win and hold the confidence and the approval of his constituents. His popularity at home had grown from the commencement of his political career, and each reelection to Congress had been with an increased majority. At the time of his death it seemed that a long career of public usefulness lay before him. Such was the man who a few brief months ago was a member of this body. Such was the man whom the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the country have lost. Such was the friend from whom we, his colleagues, have parted forever.

Others have left a more distinctive mark upon the record of this body, others have enjoyed a larger fame, but whatever his hand found to do, he did it faithfully and well; and there are few who have gone who have left behind them memories more tender and true. There are others who have had greater power to impress their convictions upon their fellows, but there are few whose advice in times of perplexity and doubt was more calm and dispassionate than his. There are very many others who have left perhaps a more enduring reputation, but in the hearts of those who knew our friend best there will be a vacancy only to be occupied when in the silent moment there comes a gracious memory of his pure life, his noble manhood, his faithful service, his lovable personality, and his gentle ways.

When he left at the close of the extra session, he had no thought but of a joyous vacation amid the delights of his home, surrounded by the glories which autumn brings in western Massachusetts; but if he could have known the fate that was in store for him, there were few things in his past life which would have caused him regret. He was exceptionally blest in the manner of his death. It came without warning, without pain or suffering, with no sorrowful partings from loved ones. He passed in an instant beyond the parting and the meeting, and sleeps amid the hills of Berkshire that he loved so well, by the side of an honored ancestry who had gone before, and who, like him, in their day had exemplified the things that are worthy and admirable in the life of man.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. WRIGHT'S characteristics have been so fully described and his qualities so accurately analyzed by my predecessors that for me to enter the usual field of eulogy would be but repetition. He was a man of such modest habits, such even temperament, such self-contained moderate nature that he did not challenge observation or description.

Although my city was formerly a part of his Congressional district and we were always neighbors, I had never met him until we were both candidates for Congress in 1892 in adjoining districts. I well remember how he then impressed me by the quiet, imperturbable, businesslike way in which he was attending to his campaign.

His district was very close and doubtful, he had not been prominent politically, he was not a public speaker, he had no very shining qualities to draw votes—and yet he was selected, I might almost say drafted by his party, to be their candidate when they were in earnest search of their most popular man. His nomination came as the result of no effort on his part; he was no self-seeker; it was fairly thrust upon him, and he accepted the unsought responsibility unflinchingly and successfully, and proved to have that quality so valuable and yet often so difficult to analyze, of being a vote getter.

He had not served the apprenticeship in the legislature which is usually demanded of Massachusetts Congressmen, and which certainly is a most useful schooling, for I doubt if there is a better forum of debate now existing than our State house, where questions are discussed on their merits without party strife or party feeling or party division, where arguments are made to influence votes and votes are turned by argument, and where men speak for immediate effect and not for advertisement or home consumption. Coming here without such legislative training, Mr. WRIGHT was at first most unobtrusive, quietly feeling his way into his new duties. Except with close friends, he was always rather grave and taciturn and reserved, and gave to strangers the impression of a serious, reflective man, not given to frivolous thoughts. He reminded me somewhat of Sydney Smith's remark to his brother:

You and I have reversed the order of nature; you have risen by your gravity and I have sunk by my levity.

I think constituents prefer that their Representatives should err on the side of dignity and seriousness, and that Mr. WRIGHT'S habitual public demeanor gave him strength and popularity. As he grew more familiar with his Congressional duties, made the acquaintance of his colleagues, and doubtless found in the friction of committee work and discussion that his modesty had underestimated himself and overestimated his associates, he became notably freer and more assertive; and men found that the quiet man whom they had perhaps overlooked had an intelligence and industry and sagacity which won him first attention, then respect, and finally confidence. And with each year of his Congressional life his influence widened, and a well-merited self-confidence developed, which increased his usefulness and popularity.

No man can obtain a very conspicuous position in this House who is not a facile speaker; but there is many a member who never opens his lips except for a necessary motion, who, by dint of long experience and acquaintance, wins a reputation for solid judgment and safe leadership more helpful than the most brilliant oratory; and Mr. WRIGHT'S third term of service, so sadly interrupted, was winning for him this distinction.

I should leave a false impression if I did not suggest that the gravity which marked his public career was thrown aside in social life, where his amiable, genial nature attracted and delighted a large circle of warm friends who mourn with us his untimely loss.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I have been requested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] to ask unanimous consent that they be permitted to print remarks which they proposed to deliver on this occasion, but found themselves necessarily compelled to be absent; and I would supplement this request by asking that any gentleman who desires to print remarks in the RECORD may have leave to do so.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be considered as granted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. As a further mark of respect, and in accordance with the directions of the House, I declare the House to be adjourned until Monday at 12 o'clock noon.

And accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2755) to authorize the President of the United States to cause certain lands heretofore withdrawn from market for reservoir purposes to be restored to the public domain, subject to entry under the homestead law with certain restrictions, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 886) for the relief of applicants to purchase public lands under the timber and stone act, reported it with amendments.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1247) to prohibit railroad companies from charging more than 3 cents per mile for carrying passengers through the Indian Territory, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BERRY. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4221) to confirm certain cash entries of public lands, to report it back favorably, without amendment, and submit a report thereon. I should like to state that this is a very short bill, which has been reported on favorably by the Secretary of the Interior and passed by the House; and as it is important, on account of certain suspended entries, that it should become a law, I ask unanimous consent to have it considered now. It will take but a very few moments, and I think there will be no objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be read.

Mr. HALE. It seems to me we had better have the regular order. Otherwise all the time will be taken up by requests for the immediate consideration of bills that we do not know anything about. I do not know anything about this bill; I do not know that I have anything against it at all; but we can certainly get along better if we proceed in regular order and let the reports and the other routine business come in in due course.

Mr. BERRY. I hope the Senator from Maine will enforce that rule on all occasions. It has been very customary recently to pass bills of this character upon being reported. I regret to have the Senator draw the line on this particular bill at this time. I should like to have him withhold his objection until after this bill is passed, and then he can make a new rule.

Mr. HALE. I shall try, so far as I can, to bear in mind the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator will let this one bill be passed, I shall have no objection to the establishment of such a rule hereafter.

Mr. HALE. I hope other Senators will join in, and I trust some other Senator will be as good natured about it as the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BERRY. I regret that the Senator makes his objection now on this bill, because I think its consideration would have been concluded by this time.

Mr. HALE. I am afraid if I do not make it now I can not make it hereafter. I shall insist upon it for to-day, at any rate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PETTIGREW, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1996) providing for the payment to the Indians of the Klamath Reservation, in Oregon, for lands excluded from the treaty reservation of said Indians by erroneous survey, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

C., a ground map of the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2323) supplemental to the act of February 9, 1821, incorporating the Columbian College in the District of Columbia, and the acts amendatory thereof, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

FOURTH OF JULY CLAIMS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to have a statement printed for the use of the Senate, containing letters of the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General, showing the number of claims presented under the law of July 4, 1864, for stores and supplies furnished or taken during the late war, the action had thereon, their present status, the law of July 4, 1864, and amendatory acts, and the rules and regulations of the War Department regarding them. There are a great many of those claims in various States, and the applicants are asking for information about them. This statement will give the desired information regarding nearly all of them, and it will be useful to the Committee on Claims and to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri? The Chair hears none; and it is ordered as requested.

DISTRICT WATER SUPPLY.

Mr. McMILLAN. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to report to the Senate any information that may be in possession of the War Department in relation to the filtration of the water supply of the District of Columbia, together with any suggestions that may be made by the Surgeon-General of the Army and the officer in charge of the Washington Aqueduct relative to such subject.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I hope the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom this resolution goes, will be able to devise and bring about some method by which the suffering people of this District can be furnished with a supply of good, pure, clean, sweet water.

I venture to say that in no part of the United States is a community of the size of that represented by the population of this District so imposed upon and abused in this most important respect as the people of the District of Columbia. It is not alone we who suffer who come here, but all the denizens of the District are confronted with the everyday use of bad, foul water, which is dangerous to drink and which makes it irksome even to take a bath. This is what ought not to be the case. We have suffered for years, on the principle, I suppose, that what is everybody's business is nobody's business. I have great faith in the efficiency of the Committee on the District of Columbia and the chairman of that committee in doing something to free us from the miserable condition we are in now.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the resolution passes, I desire, as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, to make a single observation in answer to the very proper criticisms in certain directions of the Senator from Maine.

I wish to say in behalf of the Committee on the District of Columbia, of which I chance to be a member, that that committee has not been unmindful of the fact that the water supply of the District of Columbia is not only in an unfiltered state, but that we likewise have an inadequate supply of water for the people of this District. The committee, in inquiring into this matter, has felt that the first requisite is in some way to get an adequate supply of water and then to adopt some system of filtration that would purify the water.

My impression is that the water which is furnished to the citizens of this District is not impure in quality. I think that chemical analyses have shown from time to time that the water is not hurtful to the health of the people. That it ought to be filtered goes without the saying; but a system of filtration will be an expensive matter, and under the condition of the Treasury it is very natural that the committee has moved slowly with a view to having its recommendations adopted when it got around to the making of those recommendations. I believe it was the late Senator Ingalls who said that the water of a certain river in this country is too thick to drink and a little too thin for agricultural purposes. That applies very well to the water of the Potomac River. But I will say to the Senator from Maine and to the Senate that the Committee on the District of Columbia is struggling with this matter, and that in due time the members hope to be able to solve the problem, asking the cooperation of the Senate in their very laudable undertaking.

The resolution was agreed to.

FINANCIAL POLICY.

Mr. ALLEN. On the 7th of this month I introduced a resolution, which is to be found on page 418 of the RECORD. The resolution under the rules, at the conclusion of the debate, passed to the Calendar. In view of the fact that more remarks are to be submitted in support of the views there expressed, I ask that the order be changed and that the resolution lie on the table subject to call.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the resolution is now on the Calendar and that it can be called up on motion at any time.

Mr. ALLEN. The resolution I think has gone to the Calendar by the operation of the rule, and to avoid the necessity of reintroducing it for further discussion I ask that the order be changed and that the resolution may lie on the table subject to call.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There being no objection, that will be the order. The Chair hears none. The resolution lies on the table.

REVENUE CUTTER DANIEL MANNING.

Mr. HOAR. I submit a resolution for which I ask immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to organize a board of not less than three competent persons, who shall inquire into and determine how much the hull, machinery, and appurtenances of the U. S. revenue cutter Daniel Manning, contracted for by the Department, cost the contractors over and above the contract price, if anything, and report the same to the Senate, the cost of said proceeding to be secured and defrayed by the parties in interest.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not want to object to the consideration of the resolution, but I think we are entitled to an explanation from the Senator from Massachusetts respecting it.

Mr. HOAR. I do not hear the Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not understand the propriety of the Government paying out $1,000 for a board to make the examination called for in the resolution when there is evidently competent authority in the Navy Department to make the investigation without charge to the Government.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will allow me to make a brief explanation, I think he will see that his objection has been encountered by the resolution.

There are several precedents where, when these matters were somewhat complicated and important, the parties have requested the Secretary of the Treasury to organize a board of this kind. A resolution to this effect passed the Senate the other day, making no suggestion about defraying the cost, whereupon the Secretary of the Treasury reports that it would give him pleasure to organize the board, but that there is no provision for paying the expense. This resolution repeats the other one with the addition, provided that the expense shall be defrayed and secured by the parties in interest, so that the party gets the finding of the facts by an officer appointed by the Government, but pays the charge himself under the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. I recollect the passage of the resolution a few days ago, and I thought then that it would be a wise thing to inquire into this method of proceeding. I doubt the propriety of the Government or anybody else paying the judge who passes upon this case.

Mr. HOAR. It is to be paid by the petitioner entirely. All the cost is to be paid by him.

Mr. ALLEN. But what I most desire to suggest is, that if the Government has power to enter into contract, as it has, for the construction of machinery, or for the construction of anything else that may be necessary, it has the incidental power to pass upon the question of the fulfillment of the contract. The power to contract without the power to determine the fulfillment of the contract can hardly be supposed. If it be true that we have made a contract with these parties, whoever they may be, and there has not been a fulfillment of the terms of that contract, is there not expert authority somewhere in the Department that can be detailed to pass on the question without the payment of extra money out of the Treasury?

Mr. HOAR. Unquestionably. Will the Senator allow me to read the resolution again carefully? Perhaps I do not fully understand his question.

Mr. ALLEN. I shall not object to the resolution, however.

Mr. HOAR. I think the Senator will find it is a claim under peculiar circumstances of equity by the contractors to be reimbursed a certain sum above the contract price on the ground that the article cost more than the contract price. It is not proposed to deal with that matter now, but the contractor desires that the Treasury officials shall ascertain whether it has actually cost him more than he is entitled to receive, with a view of submitting to Congress his equities. This resolve provides that the Secretary of the Treasury may do that, the contractor paying all the costs of proceeding, so that it will not cost the Government a dollar.

Mr. ALLEN. Suppose the board, or the commissioners, whatever they may be called, shall report to the Secretary of the Treasury that the material cost much more than was anticipated at the time the contract was made, that of course is to furnish the basis for a claim against the Government.

Mr. HOAR. For an application to Congress.

Mr. ALLEN. For an application to Congress. While I do not object to the Senator having the resolution passed, because it is a mere bagatelle so far as the amount expended is concerned, I do want to register my protest against any man entering into a contract with the Government of the United States and pleading the baby act.

Whenever a man enters into a contract to furnish material or to furnish labor, let him stand by that contract. Let him be bound by its terms. If the Senator from Massachusetts should enter into a contract with a builder to furnish materials for the construction of a house he would not release that builder from the terms of his contract because the material might cost him more when he came to build the house than he anticipated at the time he made the contract. If we are to pursue the course this firm, or this gentleman (I do not remember whether it is a firm or an individual), wants us to pursue, then every time a man makes a contract with the United States he will do so in anticipation of getting the Government to allow him more than he originally contracted to do the work or to furnish the material for, and the time would never come, under such circumstances, when the Government, like an individual, could be said to be rid of the terms or obligations of its contract.

Then I submit another point. Upon every simple pretext the Treasury Department and other Departments are running to Congress for small appropriations to create a board or a commission to do this and to do that. Here is the Treasury Department, with hundreds and thousands of employees in the service who are paid by the Government and who are doing all kinds of work.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator whether he understands that this particular expense is to be paid wholly by the contractors and that the United States are to pay nothing whatever?

Mr. ALLEN. I infer if the board reports that the material furnished by the contractor was more valuable than he agreed to furnish, we will be besought to allow him more than his contract calls for, and that in the end the Government will pay it.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will allow me, he has stated very strongly and very clearly and persuasively a proposition in which I am fully in accord with him. But there is one exception. There is one thing which takes this class of cases out of that general consideration, and that is that the contracts for naval machinery and the newly invented naval vessels are made in regard to a matter where there are processes of invention and improvement going on all over the world. A naval vessel is very often completed at the request of the Government and for the benefit of the Government in a way not contemplated in the original contract, and the changes which are made in the contract by the direction of the Government causes a delay which makes a change in the cost of materials even in carrying out the plans which are not changed. As I put the illustration some time ago, it is as if I should agree with a contractor to build me a cottage at Newport, with the understanding that I might, as we went on, make such changes in the plans as I should see fit, and before he got through I required him to build a Fifth Avenue Hotel in New York City.

So far as the additions are concerned, that matter is probably covered by the provision that the contractor shall be paid reasonably for the extras; but in making these changes he is obliged to wait and delay, and to make the part of the boat which is not changed at all at a time when the cost of labor and materials has risen. In such cases we have, although there has been great resistance, always paid the contractor without a dissenting vote in the Senate. But in this case we are not concluded about that matter at all The resolution only says that when the question of how much the extra cost is shall be determined, instead of the contractor bringing in his own witnesses to prove it, it shall be ascertained by persons selected by the Government, but whose costs, charges, expenses, and compensation are to be entirely defrayed by him.

That is the way the resolution reads. If the Senator can suggest any way of guarding it more thoroughly than it is now guarded, I shall consent to it, of course.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand the case to be exactly as the Senator from Massachusetts has stated; but what I say is that the Government retains in its contract the right to modify its specifications and to change the plans from time to time. The Government has in its employ a vast army of experts, competent men, who can go and examine this vessel and determine whether the contract has been complied with or not. Under those circumstances why expend any money in addition to the salaries of the experts and the compensation they are receiving to organize a board of individuals outside to pass upon the question whether the contract has been complied with and whether in equity the contractor should receive greater compensation than he has agreed to take?

What I want to emphasize is the fact that on every conceivable occasion opportunities are sought to bring into the public service useless persons or useless boards and organizations to expend the public money. We have, in round numbers, over 120,000 people in the civil service of the Government to-day. There are 25,000 people in the city of Washington occupying positions under the Government and drawing salaries from the Government who are absolutely useless and render no efficient service, and yet we are pushing the number higher and higher, and every conceivable pretext is seized on to furnish some place seeker either temporary or permanent employment at the expense of the Government.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the resolution be again read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be again read at the request of the Senator from Iowa.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. RAWLINS. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts, if he will permit me to do so, if he does not think that the resolution ought to authorize the commission, if it shall find that the cost exceeded the contract price under circumstances which would make it proper that the Government should pay the increased cost, also to find whether such claim has been settled or released? There are numerous claims of this description pending before the Committee on Claims based upon just such reports as this commission is required to make, but they do not furnish sufficient information to enable that committee intelligently to pass upon the claims.

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection to adding, at the suggestion of the Senator from Utah and also at the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], made to me in private, the words "and the facts and circumstances which led to such increased cost."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be modified as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 10, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, this being the second Monday of January, the day under the rule, I believe, is set apart for consideration of District of Columbia business. In the absence of the chairman on the Committee on the District of Columbia, I am requested to ask unanimous consent that Monday, one week from to-day, be substituted for to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa, on behalf of the Committee on the District of Columbia, asks unanimous consent that Monday next be substituted for the present day for the consideration of business of that committee. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 1197. An act for the relief of Rinaldo P. Smith, of Baltimore, Md.—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1034. An act for the relief of James Egganson, of Henderson, Ky.—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 948. An act granting a pension to Joseph M. Waddell—to the Committee on Pensions.

DEBATE ON THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House that upon the subject now under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, members have leave to print remarks for ten days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that general leave to print on the civil-service branch of the bill under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be given for ten days from this day.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I hall object. A great deal of time has been given to this matter, discussion has taken a very wide range, and it seems to me that it is hardly wise to make this extension.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely with what the gentleman from Iowa has said. A great deal of time has been spent, but there is a desire on the part of a good many members on both sides of the House to avail themselves of this leave to print; and, after consultation with members, I think it would tend to hasten the approach of the close of this debate. I do not propose at this time to ask the attention of the House to the latter subject, but if this leave be given, I entertain the hope that at a later hour in the day it may be possible for us to make some agreement. I trust gentlemen will not object. I do not ask leave to print for more than ten days.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I am decidedly in favor of any motion that will bring this debate to an early conclusion. My own judgment is that the whole business is unfortunate; and with the understanding that this leave to print shall be confined to what members would say for themselves—original matter—and what they would say upon the floor of this House, and with the assurance——

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I think I shall object anyhow.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], the Chair will appoint the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4751. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] is recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield that time to my colleague [Mr. COONEY].

Mr. COONEY. Mr. Chairman, in the eagerness with which some gentlemen have rushed forward as defenders of the President as a civil-service reformer they have rudely brushed up against the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury with rough and unsympathetic shoulders.

I have waited to see his defender issue forth from that side of the Chamber, but he has not come. All are preoccupied, either in praising the President for what he has done as a civil-service reformer in the past, or are encouraging and elaborately defending the President for what they hope and desire he may do as a spoilsman in the future.

Under these circumstances I may not be blamed with presumption if a spirit of justice and fair play urges me to defend that honorable gentleman in some of the propositions set forth in his statement of December 15 last, and to enter a protest against the manner in which that valuable statement was received, first by an evasive denial and then forgotten, by his party friends on this floor. That statement contains three simple propositions of fact:

First, that the condition of affairs brought about in his Department by the operation of the civil-service law has become a menace to efficient labor in his Department.

Second, that to relieve the Department from this menace it proposed to reduce to a salary of $900 those who are now receiving double that amount or more and who have grown old and inefficient in the service of the Government, exacting from them only a moderate amount of labor and time, and advancing young and efficient men to their positions.

Third, that this method is practically pensioning the old clerks at the rate of $75 a month, which, through the force of the civil-service law, may be put into immediate and successful operation without the aid of any other legislation or act of Congress.

Not one of these propositions has yet been successfully refuted on this floor. Not one of them has yet been dignified with an opposition of strength greater than an evasive denial; and yet, taken together and coming from such a source, they constitute an indictment against the whole law which, in the judgment of the nation, has condemned it beyond redemption by any modification that has yet been proposed by its friends.

The honorable and able member from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] has been so frequently referred to in the course of this debate that any remarks would appear out of harmony with the occasion that do not continue that reference. He is the Michael of reform, who has received commission to go forward and boldly strike out with his mailed fist, and more firmly plant in the Departments of the Government that shield that has inscribed on it the strange device of the American mugwump.

He has denounced this statement as being unfortunate at this juncture in public affairs. He has characterized it as a badge of incompetency upon the part of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury to administer the civil-service law, and has warned the Secretary of the Treasury to be more careful how he permits his assistant to talk upon this subject in the future. And why? Simply because that statement discloses at an inopportune time for the gentleman the existence of a pension attachment to the civil-service law. It is useless for gentlemen to undertake now to blind themselves or to blind others by passionate denials of Mr. Vanderlip's construction of the law, or to intimate that he is an enemy of the law, or that he is a wolf from the camp of the spoils system found in the fold of those whose fleeces are washed whiter than snow.

He is as honest and sincere a friend of the law as any reformer on this floor; he has fortified his judgment of the law by the opinion of the Civil Service Commission, and his statement before published had the approval of members of this House who know the law and are in sympathy with it. Personally I do not believe that the law in its scope is constitutional, only in the sense that disease is said to be constitutional and gathers its strength and develops its force and jurisdiction over the body by age.

But, admitting the law to be constitutional, we must then admit that the construction placed on it by Mr. Vanderlip is not strained, but is inevitably necessary. That law provides for life tenure of office. Those who favor it hold that to be the cardinal principle and vital point of the law. Is not, then, Mr. Vanderlip's proposition in the interest of economy under that law? Is not his proposition an honest effort to carry out and preserve the life-tenure features of the law, while at the same time he aims to preserve the service of his Department from the incompetency and destruction with which it is threatened by that law? But gentlemen say that he has the power and it is his duty to dismiss incompetent men. There is where the law is a dead letter. It only weakens and discourages in officers the exercise of that duty. Those upon whom this duty is imposed are in office but temporarily themselves.

They come with a retinue of friends who are seeking positions. To be a political enemy and in office fills full the measure of incompetency in the eyes of these men. The law may be a splendid machine for the purpose of manufacturing angels out of dead men, but it can not make one out of a live man. It can not change the current of human nature and of human passions. It is folly for you to expect that these men will dismiss their own political friends, whose competency has already been passed upon by your law or by the Civil Service Commission, and who are clothed with certain rights to their offices which the law sustains and supports.

It might be easy enough to dismiss a man who had never been competent, but your law is antagonistic to the very idea that time and service can render any man incompetent so long as he is able to crawl to his desk. Once competent, then the exercise of official duties only raises the degree of a man's competency, is an axiom which runs with every line of the civil-service law. If it is proposed now to modify this law, I would suggest a modification which would certainly be in harmony with its whole spirit and history; that is, to increase your appropriation and create a new and additional civil service commission at the other end of your law, whose duty it shall be to pass upon and to issue degrees and certificates of incompetency.

For I hold that it requires as varied and as exalted power of discrimination and judgment to determine the hour or the day or the year when the gout or the stone may render a Department clerk unfit for his duties as it does in the first instance to pass upon his qualifications for the office. To deal with age and its infirmities constitutes a subject the intricacies of which render it possible for ordinary mortals to say with Oliver Wendell Holmes that "to be 70 years young is sometimes more cheerful and hopeful than to be 40 years old."

But, Mr. Chairman, it is not for a moment to be believed that the men and the influences which have spent and are now devoting so much time and patient energy to the building up of a class in the service of the Government will permit their proteges to be cast out and forsaken in the hour of their decrepitude and old age. Their aim is to establish in the Departments a civic body that shall rank in importance with the Army and the Navy, and be as exclusively distinct and removed from the influences and the impulses of the people. And the plain statement of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury that there is waiting for this class a law which already bears in its bosom the healthy germ of a pension system has aroused every thoughtful and disinterested citizen to the evil possibilities of that law.

This has been foretold by the prophets and heralded by the evangelists of civil-service reform for years; but now is the first time that the subject has been taken from the realm of doubt and speculation and dignified by the announcement of one of the great Departments of Government of its entire conversion to the dogma.

Those who accuse Mr. Vanderlip of a desire to start a pension system in his Department have not read his statement closely and are not impressed with the full significance of the facts contained therein. His proposition is not to create a pension system, but to regulate and to apply the common principles of economy to a system of pensioning which he found in practical operation in the Department when he entered office.

The day that this law was launched upon its mission of reform, fifteen years ago, then its pensionary functions went into immediate operation; and although the standard of service may have been maintained and elevated by more critical and thorough examinations of applicants, and by agencies that are foreign to and not to be credited to the law, such as the application of new methods brought about by time and invention, and by the constant addition of new forces in the Departments, yet the fact still remains that during all that time, through the silent yet energetic influences of the life-tenure feature of your law, there has been in the Departments a constant accretion of incompetents maintained at the expense of the Government, until now they have reached such formidable proportions that one of the chief officers of the Administration, a friend of the law, is constrained to declare that their numbers have become a menace to the service of the Government.

His testimony does not stand alone. The Commissioner of Pensions before the Senate committee said that in his Bureau there are one hundred such employees who are practically pensioners upon the bounty of the Government, and if he could reduce his force by that number the service in his Department would be more satisfactory. Of all the arguments that have been put forth to sustain this law, not one exists whose force has not been shattered and broken down by the operation of the law itself. All the bright hopes of patriots and friends of good government that have clustered around it from the beginning have in the fierce light of experience either faded or turned into contempt.

The only moral argument that can sustain this law is that long and untrammeled tenure of office brings to the service of the Government that knowledge and adeptness which is necessary to conduct its business and which experience alone can supply. Yet we now have the declaration from one of the great Departments of the Government that the law and the argument are broken down; that under the test of experience both have failed; and the tree that has been transplanted from the soil of the mother country, and here welcomed and warmed by the ardent embraces and watered by the loving tears of the reformer, has, in the language of Mr. Vanderlip, "become dead at the top, as it were."

Mr. Chairman, in the hands of any political party the present law is nothing more than a trick, a cheat, an arrant swindle, and is an instrument proper for only knaves to handle.

My first experience with the practical operations of the civil-service law occurred last spring at the Pension Bureau. There is a board of examining commissioners in a town of about 35,000 inhabitants in my district, which was incidentally informed through the public press that its annual earnings did not exceed $900 and that it was subject to be decapitated at the pleasure of the Administration.

In the interest of the board I visited the Bureau and had a recasting of its accounts, which showed the earnings to be about $915, placing it within the protection of the law. The clerk with whom I transacted the business was a new man recently elevated to his position. I was a new member, and presuming that I had come in the interest of the policies of the new Administration, he undertook to sympathize with me on account of what appeared to him to be a formidable barrier in my way to the removal of the old board and the installation of one that bore the complexion of the present Administration.

He informed me that I could relieve myself by preferring some charge against the board, and if I did not have any serious charge I could found one on ill or rough treatment, or language used by the board or by any of its members in the examination of the old soldier, and that would be sufficient. When I had the opportunity, I informed the gentleman that I was a Democrat, that I had come to the Department in the interest of the board, and was happy to inform him that the members of that board were men who stood high in their profession, and besides were gentlemen against whom I did not believe anyone could be found to bring the slightest charge.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for ten minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. COONEY. I left that Department agreeably conscious that here, at least, were three Democrats in my district whose interest in their petty offices could not be disturbed by a change in the Administration. Ah, gentlemen, I was sadly mistaken. In about a month or six weeks thereafter, this Department, recognizing the fact that $915 must bring very onerous work upon one board, thought it was to the interest of the service to give them some relief. So it appointed a new and additional board at the same point, and through the favors of that Department it is expected that this new board will so divide the fees with the old that in a little while there will be no board left at that point that will be under the protection of the law, and the field will be clear to the Administration to install permanently a new one of its own that bears its own trade-mark and wears its own collar.

The Civil Service Commission, that Briareus of a hundred powerful arms, that Argus with a hundred all-seeing eyes, that has been set up as a terror to the unregenerate and the unreformed who dare to enter the precincts or pollute the altar of civil-service reform with their presence, has, as I understand, folded up its hundred arms and has closed ninety-nine of its hundred eyes, while it keeps one open with which to wink at the evasions of the law. [Laughter.]

It says that "it has no power to remedy this wrong; that such is the law, and such is civil-service reform." [Applause.] That same board is composed of gentlemen very pleasantly situated themselves, scholarly gentlemen, who with great politeness can and do answer all manner of questions in all manner of ways that may be propounded to them. This commission initiates the neophyte from the rural districts into a comprehension of the grewsome pleasures and grim jokes of civil-service reform; and to those who inquire concerning their tenure of office its reply is as clear, as satisfactory, and as prophetically true as that given by the ancient Pythian to the king who asked the same question:

> Yes, you and your posterity shall enjoy the office, until an ass shall ascend to the throne.

[Applause and laughter.]

The President has informed us that he has issued an order to the different Departments of the Government to remove clerks "only on written charges and hearings." We must admit that this would seem to be in the interest of justice, and it is where the clerk and the head of the Department are of the same political persuasion; but where they are of different politics the clerk is a fool who will tarry for the hearing.

These hearings and written charges are no new methods of accomplishing partisan purposes. They are not unknown to history. Such written charges and hearings were common in the merry old days of England when Jeffreys sat at the "bloody assizes" and yelled out to the trembling accused, "Cut your words short, you villain, and plead guilty, you most infamous scoundrel, or it will be worse for you!" I do not desire now to change my opinion of Mr. Jeffreys, and therefore I am not willing to class with him the Republican party, or to cast upon it or its Administration any abuse for their tortuous methods in evading, in the interest of their own political friends, a law that the people have never sanctioned, which has been enlarged upon by powers over which they have had no control and under pretenses that are darkly false and fraudulent.

The efforts of the Republican party to evade this law is evidence to my mind that the constituents of that party still believe in popular government; still have faith in the people's ability to govern themselves; and that they are not yet ready to relinquish into the hands of any class the benefits and rights that flow to them from that government.

In this I rejoice. It is likewise an evidence to my mind that there are many Representatives of that party upon the floor of this House who only play the part of being struck speechless at the ludicrous spectacle of some enthusiastic reformer jumping up and grasping the specter of the spoils system and advancing it up and down yonder aisles as the mace of authority and obedience to the law.

In their speechlessness they still know, and the people know, and God Almighty knows, that the present law, with its attendant life-tenure feature, is a more surreptitious, far-reaching, rapacious, cowardly, sordid, and mean spoils system than any that has ever yet been invented in this country by cunning greed to glut a pampered class by robbing the hardy sons of American citizens of a heritage and ambition that ennoble them. We are not confronted by the alternative of clinging to this law or adopting the old spoils system. There is another system of civil service in this country which exists in practical operation throughout the several States, which has been tried for years and which has met with the approbation of the people.

Every article of the Constitution of our country breathes animosity against the idea of life tenure in office. As has been said, there is but one exception, and that is in the case of the judiciary. This Constitution and the constitutions and laws of the several States lay down the correct American theory of civil service in this country—a term of years founded upon qualification, justice, and certainty. If you adopt this theory upon which to build your law of reformation, then you can not go astray, nor can you build too high. Your law will then be in line with American institutions, and the American people will sustain and support it.

This law, founded upon the English system, has now been in force some fifteen years, yet it has not brought satisfaction or peace for a single day. But I warn gentlemen not to dally with this insidious law much longer. Time may ripen the forces of despotism that lie hidden in its bosom, and instead of being what it now appears to be to us—a mere carpet, woven from the threads of Arabian imagination, which by the shifting magical wand of political power may be made to cover much or to cover nothing—it may crystallize itself into a potent law in the hands and for the benefit of those in whose interest it was first ingrafted upon the laws of this country, and the rich, and the powerful, and the college-bred classes, who are now only waiting for the opportunity as they only know how to wait, will come forward and take control of the Departments of the Government at the expense of your own constituents.

This law was not founded so much upon the theory of qualification as upon the heredity of class.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for three minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. COONEY. It is not founded so much upon qualification as it is upon the heredity of class. Examination and qualification were required before this law ever saw the light of existence. It is only the heredity of class that has been added. I believe in qualification, no matter how high, and I am in favor of it. I believe, too, in heredity, but only to despise and hate it.

That is the badge that was placed upon our first parents to show that they had sinned; and from that day down to this there has never been, and from this day to the crack of doom there can never be, a single instance of thorough, permanent, and practical reformation, either in morals or in politics, that is not in antagonism to heredity. Any system founded upon or allied with heredity is a movement backward and downward; based upon opposition to it is forward and upward. If this system is to be perpetuated as an institution of this country, I predict that its results will be the creation of those conditions in the life of the Republic which will require a very different kind of reformation at the hands of those who come after us than that which is now urged by the disciples of this law. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DORR] is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. DORR. Mr. Chairman, I have grown weary of the contention, so often made on this floor and elsewhere, that the Republican party is irrevocably committed to the maintenance of the present civil-service law. I regard my duty to my country as my first and highest duty as a member of this House. Therefore, believing that the fundamental principles of that law are un-American and fraught with danger to the Republic, I shall vote for its repeal, regardless of political platforms.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not regard a declaration in favor of "civil-service reform" as an approval of the law as it is now enforced in this country. The "civil service" embraces not merely the "classified" positions, but all branches of the public service except the military. To reform is to correct, to form anew, to amend. Therefore reform in any branch of the civil service is "civil-service reform." That which would be reform in the opinion of one might be retrogression in the opinion of another. In other words, it is merely a question of opinion as to what "civil-service reform" really is. Moreover, the act of 1883 was not passed as a partisan measure. Even though it had been distinctively a Republican measure and the subsequent platform declarations of the party in favor of "civil-service reform" had been intended as a specific indorsement of that act, it was only an experiment, like the Sherman silver law, for example, and if our experience proves that its enactment was an error, it is our duty to repeal it, regardless of the political organization to which we may belong.

I am opposed to the civil-service law because it was an innovation upon the system established by our forefathers, the wisdom of which has been demonstrated by experience. I am opposed to it because it is a contradiction of the proud boast of Americans that the pathway of the humblest citizen in the land to any position within the gift of the people is always open and untrammeled. I am opposed to it because it favors the classes against the masses. I am opposed to it because it creates life tenure of office, thereby building up a favored class of Government beneficiaries, to the exclusion of the great body of the people. I am opposed to it because it violates the foundation principles of our Government. I am opposed to it because it is a step in the direction of reestablishing the form of government that was repudiated by the American people in 1776.

Until this foreign system was thrust upon us the American idea had always been that this is a people's Government. The just and logical sequence is that when an officer is chosen by the people and is responsible to the people for his official acts he should have the power to choose his subordinates, for whose action he is also responsible to the people. But a new light seems to have dawned upon a portion of our people, who imagine that they can see danger in the contest of political parties for power and positions, and they therefore seek to transfer the power of government from the people to a commission. Such an idea of government is in harmony with a monarchy, but it can not prevail in a republic.

Gentlemen, ours is a government of the people, and such it must remain. Instead of the contest for office being an evil, it affords the only school for the political education of the people. The idea that by divorcing the Government, or any part of it, from political contests it can be made better is a false one. The Government can not be better than the political party controlling it, commission or no commission. A stream can not rise higher than its source.

If our popular form of government is to be thus throttled, we might as well abandon the voting process entirely and substitute commissioners for the examination of all candidates for office, from President down, and install those who obtain the highest percentage. There is no middle ground upon which we can consistently stand. No good reason has ever been given, and none can be given, for applying the civil-service law to the minor places and not to the higher ones. If competitive examinations give better results in one class of positions, they would give better service in all. In fact, there is even a stronger reason, if this system be correct, for applying the law to the Cabinet officers than to their clerks, because the duties of the former positions require more knowledge and a higher order of ability.

At present we have the political system for the one class and the so-called merit system for the other. The two are antagonistic. If we are going to continue this civil-service system, let us be consistent, like the Chinese, who for thousands of years have applied it to all of their officials save the Emperor. It is probably satisfactory to them, because they have no intelligent conception of popular government. But it is a sad reflection upon a people like ours, who have been educated for freedom and are capable of self-government.

I deny that competitive examinations improve the public service. Our experience does not prove it. They may secure persons with a higher degree of technical education, but not with a greater degree of efficiency in the discharge of public duty. This depends upon qualifications that can not be determined, as a general rule, by any test of literary training. Most of the positions in the public service could be filled with persons possessing a common-school education and common sense, who would render just as efficient service as the average Yale or Harvard graduate.

A favorite contention of the advocates of the civil-service law is that it is its purpose to place the public service on a business basis. But is there a single business house, bank, or railroad in the country that would be willing to accept its clerical force or other employees from the certifications of the Civil Service Commission or that would exchange with the commission its method of selecting its employees? Not one. I do not contend that there should not be a test of qualifications, but I do insist that a separate bureau is not essential in making the test.

If I were charged with the management of a public office, I would prefer to select my subordinates as did Jefferson and Jackson. First of all, I should ask: "Is he a Republican?" If answered in the negative, that would end the examination. If an affirmative answer were given, then I would ask: "Is he honest?" "Is he capable?" "Is he faithful?" A satisfactory answer having been given to these questions, I would then consider him eligible to an appointment. Being responsible for his official action, I would prefer to be the judge of his eligibility. If there be positions in the public service requiring the retention of experienced persons, and where a change would, for that reason, be inadvisable, the head of the Department is certainly competent to ascertain that fact, and he ought to be trusted to protect himself and the public interests accordingly.

It is alleged that the public service was demoralized by wholesale dismissals under the old system. This allegation is not supported by the facts. No Administration ever has and no Administration ever will make a clean sweep of the offices upon its accession to power. I doubt if there was as much demoralization then as there is now. Under the old system reductions and removals were made openly and honestly. Under the civil-service law they are made clandestinely and by indirection. The effect of this is to build up and encourage a system of espionage and persecution, the most potent agencies of demoralization that could be put into operation. In the one case the employee knows what to expect and governs himself accordingly. In the other he is constantly on the "anxious seat" and knows not at what hour nor in what way he may be assailed.

The civil-service law is not only wrong in principle and productive of injustice and inequality of privileges in the public service, but it is a constant and useless drain upon the public revenues, as well as upon the incomes of the people who are deceived by its false allurements. In addition to $120,659.52 expended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, for the salaries of the regular force of the commission and to meet the expenses of the examinations held elsewhere than at the seat of Government, the annual salary of the force now on detail at the commission, who are paid out of the appropriations for the various Departments to which they respectively belong, is in the aggregate $50,864.

In addition to this, it is estimated that there have been no less than 200 suits instituted involving various questions raised in construing this law. This litigation not only embarrasses the administration of the public service, but results in a waste of much of the time of the courts and other officials that could be profitably devoted to business of more importance to the Government. Add to all this the energy and eloquence wasted in useless and unprofitable discussion of these questions by statesmen in and out of Congress, and you will then begin to realize the enormous burden that this incubus upon popular government entails upon the people.

And still there is more. During the last fiscal year there were 50,244 applicants examined. Although 24,163 of these successfully passed the examination, only 3,308 were given places. So, aside from the 25,000 and more who waited in uncertainty for months before they were notified of their failure to pass, here is a vast army of nearly 21,000 who, notwithstanding their eligibility, had all of their trouble for nothing. And the greatest injustice of it all is that the chief reason they failed to get appointments was because the positions were filled, in a great measure, by those who never passed a competitive examination, but were appointed as a recognition of party service, classified by an extension order issued by an Executive of their own political faith, and are now protected from removal by a law with the requirements of which they did not comply when they entered the service.

Such gross injustice deserves to be called a political crime, and if, with the power in our hands, we allow it to stand, we are guilty of compounding the crime. No political party can hope to remain in power if it permits such an injustice to the rank and file of its organization.

Twenty dollars is a conservative estimate of the average expenses of an applicant attending these examinations. So that, in round numbers, there was a million dollars expended during the last fiscal year alone by persons who, aside from their loss of time, did not receive the slightest benefit in return for their expenditure. Another result of these fruitless examinations is that the energy of the applicant is paralyzed by the hope of an appointment thus held out to him, and in consequence the avenues open to him for other employment are neglected.

The foregoing are not the only evil effects of this system. I am informed that there is in this city an institution called "The National Correspondence Institute," which is conducted by Mr. J. W. McKinley. Its claim to patronage is based upon the theory that it has peculiar facilities for preparing applicants for a civil-service examination. It is situated in the very shadow of the headquarters of the Civil Service Commission. It has patrons all over the country, and I am informed that it expends annually thousands of dollars for advertisements and that it has on its pay rolls from time to time almost a hundred clerks and experts. The fees paid to this institution by those who successfully passed the examinations and by those who obtained appointments have not only met this enormous expense, but have netted Mr. McKinley a handsome fortune.

All of this money comes from a credulous and hopeful people, who imagine that, in some mysterious way, the institution can obtain them admission to the sacred portals of the Civil Service Commission. It is not my purpose to question the legitimacy of the methods of this institution, nor to seek to injure the young man's business. On the contrary, I rather admire, and feel constrained to commend, his enterprising genius. The wrong is not in him but in the law that enables his business to thrive. The institution is the logical and legitimate result of a pernicious principle—a fungus growth upon a false system—and I merely mention it as an object lesson of the expensive results and burdensome folly of the civil-service law.

Under the plausible but misleading title of "the merit system" the advocates of the civil-service law seek to make the impression that under it public patronage is equally and fairly distributed. This is not the case. The term is a misnomer, because the law has not given pro rata recognition to the people of all the States and Territories. It has enabled those living at or near the seat of Government to obtain the greater share of patronage. For example, the District of Columbia, which, under a fair apportionment, would be entitled to only 39 positions in the Departments here, has received 2,396. And it has been shown that 500 of these were chosen from the certifications of the commission during the last Administration of President Cleveland and appointed in the Treasury Department alone. These excesses have been taken from the rightful patronage of the less-favored section of the country.

It may be contended that the same inequality would result under the old system. But under that system the wrong could be righted by the heads of the Departments, which now this can not be done. The civil-service law perpetuates the wrong. After Mr. Cleveland had snugly tucked his party friends into the public service, removing Republicans without giving them a chance to show that they were competent and worthy of retention aside from their political opinions, we now return to power, and when those who were thus summarily removed seek reinstatement they are confronted with the "one-year rule," and required to show cause, other than politics, for the removal of the men who took their places, and also to give them written notice of the cause and allow them an opportunity to make defense.

These are privileges that were not accorded Republicans. Such a rule is practically a disbarment from the service, because the greater part of those who now occupy these places are efficient and worthy of retention, save as to their Democracy. Such treatment is not just to the men who lost their positions because of their politics and then went out on the battlefield and helped us to win another victory. They should at least have the same opportunities as did their Democratic successors.

Not content with the injury and injustice it has already wrought, this octopus is still reaching out its arms for further spoliation. In one of its annual reports the commission says:

> It is the opinion of the commission that the fourth-class post-offices may be included in the classification by Executive order. When these extensions of the classification have been made, and the four-year tenure-of-office acts are repealed, and when regulations are in successful operation in all the Departments requiring that promotions be based on the efficiency of the employees, the reforms in the executive civil service will be practically complete. The service will then be restored to that condition in which it was intended to be kept by the wise founders of our Government.

If this report had included a recommendation for the establishment of a civil pension list, which is the ultimate intent of these theorists and the logical result of their theory, the structure thus described would, from their standpoint, have been complete. But these propositions, when put into operation, will complete the perversion rather than the restoration of the purposes of the wise founders of our Government. Instead of laying the foundation for universal life tenure in office, the framers of our fundamental law were extremely jealous of conferring this specious privilege, wisely confining it to the Federal judiciary. I am unalterably opposed to the repeal of the tenure-of-office acts. I regard them as one of the surest safeguards of the Republic, and rotation in office as an imperative demand of the American people. To carry out these recommendations of the commission would endanger the perpetuity of our free institutions and would be a deathknell to popular government in this country.

While I do not approve of the application of the vulgar term of "spoilsmen" to those of us who are pleading for the equal rights of the people, yet, in order that I may be fully understood, I will use the term in its common acceptation, and declare that I am a "spoilsman." I have no patience with that class of people who are constantly sneering at the "office seekers" when they themselves have been seeking office all of their lives. I am an office seeker. I do not deny it. So are you all, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House. Let us accord to others the same privileges we claim for ourselves.

The ambition of the humblest applicant for office is just as commendable and just as dear to him as the lofty ambition of those who seek the highest offices in the land. It is contended by some that the people are in favor of this law. I beg to call attention to the fact that a very respectable minority of 6,000,000 of voters in this country recently supported a platform declaring against its fundamental principle. Unless I am sadly misled as to the sincerity of gentlemen, there are a few in this and the other branch of Congress who did not support that platform but oppose this law. And there are indications that this character of opposition is not confined to Congress.

We have only had one separate, direct vote upon the question. That was in the State of Maryland last November. Although this is a Republican State, the vote was 87,000 against the law and only 15,000 for it. This verdict is only a counterpart of the recent declarations of the Republicans of the great States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Kentucky.

Mr. Chairman, the people of this country have been misled as to the extent and purport of this law. They are just beginning to understand its iniquities, and they are rising up in arms against it. If we do not meet the question here we will have to meet it at the ballot box in 1900.

The voice of the people cries out for repeal. "The voice of the people is the voice of God," and woe be unto the political fortunes of him who does not heed it. [Applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the time of Mr. DORR having expired, by unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. MAHANY, it was extended for five minutes.

Mr. McRAE. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition whatever to make an argument upon this question. I desire to state that this bill, if carried into law, makes an appropriation for $93,340 for the expenses of the Civil Service Commission. In the Fifty-third Congress a yea-and-nay vote was taken on a motion to strike this item out of the appropriation bill. The striking out of the appropriation would scarcely reach any result; but I am so utterly opposed to this whole system of civil service and its legislation that I voted at that time to strike out the appropriation, and I shall be exceedingly glad if our friends on the other side will afford me an opportunity to vote for the entire repeal of this vicious legislation.

Mr. McRAE. I yield the remainder of my time, twenty minutes, to my colleague [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, standing with the Democratic party and its platform, I desire to say that I am opposed to the civil service in principle, in theory, and in practice. Its principles as now practiced I regard as undemocratic, contrary to the genius of our Republic, and positively obnoxious to the great mass of the people of our country. In its theories it is a humbug; it promises and never performs. In practice it is a colossal fraud. If administered according to the intention of its authors and advocates, it leads to a life tenure in office which ought to be and is intolerable to every patriotic American citizen.

I have never been able to discover, Mr. Chairman, why a man who has enjoyed his share of the good things of life when he was young, occupying a good position, drawing a good salary, and doing light work, when he grows old should be entitled to any more of the benefactions of the Government than the man who has been compelled to toil in the sunshine and storm to make a living for himself and his family. The only exception made under our Constitution in favor of life tenure in office was yielded to the Federal judiciary, and that after a long and continued contest; and I believe, Mr. Chairman, if the present has not established the fact, that the future will demonstrate that this was one of the great mistakes made by the wise and good men who framed our Constitution. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If, sir, the men who occupy seats in the Supreme Court of this Government had to respond to the voice of the people, we would have no fear that there ever would be a rule permanently established in this country whereby the property and incomes of the rich would be exempt from taxation and the burdens of the Government placed upon the poor but industrious people. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to enter into a general discussion of the civil service. Our friends on the other side, I think, are engaged in a very profitable discussion, one that will demonstrate to the country the insincerity of their platform and their inability to administer the principles upon which they were elected. I was a long time in the brush before I knew who was chargeable with this civil-service storm. The Republican convention relieves me of further doubt. The platform reads:

The civil-service law was placed upon the statute book by the Republican party—

And this is the first time in the history of this House that a party has turned to destroy its own progeny—which has always sustained it—and we renew our repeated declarations that it shall be thoroughly and honestly enforced and extended wherever practicable.

And they say—

No modification is suggested, no repeal suggested. But we find when we come to this Congress that men who were elected upon that platform seek now to destroy it, and I am reminded of the couplet of Sir Walter Scott:

Oh, what a tangled web we weave
When first we practice to deceive.

[Laughter.]

Gentlemen, you find yourselves divided, and you will find yourselves incapable of dealing with this evil unless you receive the support of the Democratic side; and you will not receive that on any amendment you may offer whereby you may expect to relegate Democrats out and Republicans in. If you want to repeal it, if you want to strike down the evil, I believe you will have the support of almost all gentlemen on this side of the House; but no amendment which does not carry out, in good faith, the demands of the Democratic platform can receive our support.

Now, Mr. Chairman, on January 5 my friend from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] made use of this truthful language, this real prophecy, this inspired truth, as the future will demonstrate:

We propose that they shall be corrected—

Speaking of the evils of the civil service—and if this Congress does not correct them, the people, shod with indignation and clothed with wrath, will send a Congress here that will correct them.

Right, my friend! A Congress will be here after the next election, and a Congress bold enough and true enough to the American people to deal with this question and all other public questions as they should be—in the interests of the people. The gentleman seems to have lost hope.

Also the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON], on January 5, made use of this prophetic language:

And I tell the gentleman from Pennsylvania—

Speaking to Mr. BROSIUS—

And I tell the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and with this I close, that ever since this law was passed—the Democrats ought not to hear this, but they know it [laughter]—ever since this law was passed, at every election following the election of a President the House of Representatives goes against the party in power, and at the next quadrennial election it goes against the party in power for the control of the Presidency, and it will be so just as long as the Republican party will permit itself and its policy to be guided by the pious and holy gentlemen in William street and their disciples.

These gentlemen seem to have lost all hope for the future of the grand old party. I commend to them the following lines, which are, I believe, from Milton:

So farewell hope, and with hope farewell fear;
Farewell remorse; all good to me is lost.
Evil, be thou my good.

But, Mr. Speaker, the distinguished and original gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY], on December 10, 1897, more vividly portrayed the evil way of the Republican party and its dismal future in this splendid, inimitable declaration:

The gentleman can rely much on party organization.

Referring to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN], I believe.

The gentleman can rely much on party organization. I must rely upon the purifying process of reasoning addressed to the intellect and conscience. And let me tell you that if this system of civil service continues I will not get 19,000 votes next year. Neither will the Republican party in my State present force enough to grease a gimlet to bore a hole to bury ourselves.

The truth is that prophecy will be true not only in North Carolina, but nowhere in this great country will there be enough of the old machine left to serve the purpose indicated by the gentleman from North Carolina. To him I breathe these pleasant lines:

Come, disappointment, come,
But not in thy terrors clad,
Come in thy meekest, saddest guise
To the reckless and the bad.

Mr. Chairman, not only has the Republican party gone back on this part of its platform, but we all know that during the last campaign you were all bimetallists of the international kind. To-day you are but the chained slaves of gold monometallism, unable to free yourselves from its embrace. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Gage, the financial high priest and mouthpiece of the Administration, declares that the purposes of the bill prepared by him which has been presented to the Committee on Banking and Currency is designed to more thoroughly and permanently commit the country to the gold standard; and it proposes to go beyond that and destroy the greenback, to destroy the silver certificates, and to surrender the sovereignty of this Government to the national banks, and thereby make the burdens of the people more intolerable.

Mr. Chairman, if this was all the wrath of the people might be stayed for a time; but there is a sadder question. There is a question involving human liberty, the life of a struggling people—a question whether the good offices of this Government shall be used in behalf of the struggling patriots of Cuba. Let me read, Mr. Chairman, a declaration of Gen. Maximo Gomez, a message sent by him to the American people on Christmas morning. He says:

> All that I have to say regarding this great and heroic war in Cuba is a complete ratification of our manifesto issued at Monte Christo. You may make it known to the American people that it is the firm resolution of the army and people of Cuba, who have shed so much blood in order to gain their independence, not to falter in their just cause until death or triumph crowns their efforts.
> M. GOMEZ.

Language as eloquent as ever dropped from the burning lips of Patrick Henry. It comes from a man whose patriotism and courage rank high among the patriots and soldiers of any age.

These people struck the blow for liberty, and for three years they have maintained it with a courage and sacrifice and devotion that has won the love and respect of liberty-loving people all over the world. One-third of their population has been destroyed, and every breeze that blows from the sunlit shores of that ill-fated island bears upon its bosom the tears and prayers of a struggling people. They learned their songs of liberty from our people, they gathered the hope of freedom from our flag, and yet the majority on the other side of this House sit unmoved and unconcerned.

Mr. Chairman, the same tyranny that rides down these people has insulted our flag. It has destroyed twenty millions of property of our people and has imprisoned and outraged our citizens. How long shall this great country submit to these great outrages at the hands of this puny and decaying monarchy? Mr. Chairman, how long must liberty, bleeding, wait for affirmative action upon the part of our Government? Let us act promptly, let us act now, let our love for liberty and humanity inspire us to uphold the banner of liberty in the hands of these struggling people.

> Oh, give, great God, to freedom's waves to ride
> Sublime o'er Conquest, Avarice, and Pride—
> To sweep where Pleasure decks her guilty bowers,
> And dark Oppression builds her thick-ribb'd towers.

Touch but the shores of Cuba with our flag, and the shouts of her freedom will roll round the world. [Applause.]

[Mr. BRUMM addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] who addressed the House on Saturday with a very able argument against the existing law complained that the advocates of the merit system had taken a certain advantage. He said that they had adopted the nomenclature, that they had established the names, and the result was that the opponents of the law were stigmatized by epithets which were not complimentary. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have listened with quite a degree of attention to this debate, and I do not think that either side can lay claim to a monopoly of epithets. I remember very clearly the speech of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who attacked and denounced the supporters of this law, not merely individually, but en masse—not only the living, but also the dead.

The gentleman from Ohio stigmatized a whole convention of men, a convention held in the city of Cincinnati, as "foul-mouthed demagogues." This may be highly argumentative, but I do not think it can be called strictly complimentary. Then the gentleman from Ohio, if I remember correctly, did not express the most unqualified approval of the career of Mr. Carl Schurz, or of Mr. George William Curtis, a gentleman who was advocating the liberty of the slave and was pointing the way to freedom and the north star before the gentleman from Ohio began his political life, and before the Republican party was born, and who, for over thirty years, valiantly fought the battles of that party. They were stigmatized by the gentleman from Ohio as traitors.

And how about the Civil Service Commissioners? I have a recollection that something denunciatory of those gentlemen has been uttered on this floor. In fact, as I have listened to the speeches of the opponents of this law concerning the Civil Service Commissioners and their crimes the wonder has grown from what quarter of the globe, from what shore, such monsters of iniquity as these three men could have come.

Again we have had paraded here that very ancient individual, "Miss Nancy." Supporters of the law have been called "Miss Nancys"—a terrible piece of invective certainly, and one sanctioned by long usage. That epithet was made to do service nearly twenty years ago, but I supposed that it had now passed into a deserved retirement.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this matter is not to be settled by the calling of names. I do not think, however, that the advocates of the other side of the question have anything to complain of in this regard. It seems to me that, considering the ability of gentlemen who have taken part in opposition to this law, the debate has been very infertile of any real argument against it. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] left nothing to be said by way of entertaining the House, and he also left nothing to be said against the evils of the old spoils system, for he rehearsed here by the hour transactions that had occurred under that system and before the rules were applied to the offices to which he referred as a reason for repealing the law.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON], a gentleman of rare scholarship, made a speech which was indeed rich in diction, but which was very unfruitful of any real reason why the law should be changed. If, as he alleged, this law had been improperly extended to laborers, and they have been brought into classified service, the remedy for that certainly is not in repealing the law, but in punishing those who were guilty of violating it. We can take nearly all of their arguments, and we find that they singularly fail to fit the conclusions reached by the gentlemen. They show defective administration. They show that the officers appointed to administer this statute have done things which they ought not to have done; and what do they propose? Do they propose some new penal provisions of the statute? Do they propose an inquiry or an impeachment of those officers who have violated the law? Not at all; but they propose that the law shall be absolutely repealed. They propose a return to the abominations of the old system, with a recital of which they decorate their speeches.

Mr. Chairman, in endeavoring to find the amount of legislation that will satisfy the opponents of this system, I have carefully listened to the arguments, but I have failed to see what amount of change would satisfy them. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] was more nearly frank than anybody else. You will remember that he first perverted and then indorsed George Washington, with reference to his expressions in the Pickering letter, when he said, speaking of the office of Attorney-General, that he did not propose to appoint any man to "an office of consequence" who differed from him in political views.

Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] made an estimate. He said, "Is not that office an office of consequence?" And so, going through the list, he concluded that the "offices of consequence" to which George Washington must have alluded would be about 95 per cent of all the offices of the Government. Those offices he would exclude, because they were important. Very shortly after that he came to some offices that he would exclude because they were unimportant, positions like those of janitors, laborers, and conductors of elevators. He would exclude these because they were unimportant. He did not state the proportion that these offices bore to the whole number of offices in the service, but on looking at the reports I find that they cover about 20 per cent of the whole number. So, as I understand, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] is in favor of reform to this extent—he would appoint about 115 per cent of all our officers under the spoils system. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] made a very coherent argument and one that was directed to the system. He advocated the old methods of making appointments. He thought that the Member of Congress or the Senator from the place which the appointee came from was the best qualified to pick out the officer. He said that the member of Congress would be apt to know the applicants. In the next place the member would be directly answerable to the people. Well, this is all very well in theory, but as a matter of fact how would it work? The member of Congress does know the applicants; but suppose he picks out a man in his district absolutely with reference to the public good, and with reference to the man's ability to render public service and without reference to his political pull? Is not the member going to get into trouble? It would be known beforehand that he would have the selection of the officer.

Here are numerous men who have been working for him. It is known that a certain office is to be filled. Immediately there are two or three or half a dozen hostile camps, each bringing to bear upon the member of Congress the strongest pull of which it is capable. Now, if the member disregards all these pulls and picks out the best man, it may be a man of his own party, but some one of modest merit who has not made much noise in the campaign, and if he acts against the wishes of the leading politicians of the district, when he comes to account to the people, where is the member of Congress going to be found?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. He will not be found at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCALL. Why, he will be defeated. He will not be found at all, as my friend here suggests. The trouble is that the member of Congress does not exercise his own judgment. The question as to who shall hold these offices is settled purely upon political grounds, and is decided in favor of the person having the greatest political pull. Then the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] said that this method of appointment through the members of Congress would tend to keep alive party spirit and party enthusiasm, which otherwise would die out. Well, that is very good in theory, but as a matter of fact it tends to produce divisions in parties.

Let us apply the theory for just a moment. Suppose since President McKinley came into office the old system had been thoroughly applied. Suppose every Democrat had been turned out of the public service and a Republican had been put in his place? Would this produce party enthusiasm? What effect would this have upon the nineteen applicants for every office who did not get that office? Would they be enthusiastic in the next campaign over their failure to get office? Why, certainly not. Then the enthusiasm of the party in power would be confined to men who held office; and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], under his theory, would expect them to take part in running the campaign and in managing the politics of the people. That is the sort of "enthusiasm" that the American people resent. Here again the theory does not work very well in practice.

But if you want an object lesson, all you have to do is to visit countries where what is called the merit system is applied, and you will find there that, although these nonpolitical offices are taken out of politics, party spirit rages high whenever there is a great issue presented. I deny that the American people, in order to get enthusiastic in a campaign, must have held out before their hope 100,000 or 200,000 or any number of offices.

That is a libel upon popular government. If it is a fact that we can not take an interest in public affairs and can not decide questions in the way in which it has been thought best for a free people to decide them, upon their merits as public policies, then it seems to me self-government comes very near being a failure.

Mr. Chairman, if there is any one principle that can be considered as established in our system by the faith of party platforms, it is that nonpolitical offices ought to be taken out of politics. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has alluded to exceptional things which have crept into our platforms, like the advocacy of woman suffrage, issues that have made a single appearance in national platforms, and he cites them as precedents for disregarding our pledges upon civil-service reform.

What is the fact with reference to this reform? Our Republican convention in 1872 declared in as strong terms as it could possibly employ in favor of reform in the civil service, and every national platform adopted by our party from that time until 1896 has had substantially the same declaration. How has it been with regard to the platforms of the Democratic party? That party is usually found lagging behind its great rival anywhere from a decade to a generation; and yet we find that it is not much behind on this question. In 1872 it declared that civil-service reform was vitally necessary in this country, and every platform adopted by that party from 1872 to 1896 has reiterated this declaration in even more emphatic language. The platform of 1896 commended the merit system. It was for the merit system as against filling these minor political offices upon mere political considerations. It did declare against life tenure in holding office, but few believe in that.

So I say that if anything can be regarded as settled in this country by the declaration of political parties, it is that the merit system is a fixture in our politics. The declaration in its favor is not one that has appeared in a single platform or in only two platforms, but in all platforms adopted by both the great parties in this country for the last generation, and any man who believes in party faith, with these repeated and reiterated declarations in its favor, must consider himself bound by them.

But not merely the declarations of your platforms, but the position of every man in the Presidency elected since the civil war has been in favor of the civil-service reform. General Grant favored it. Garfield and Hayes advocated it. I myself, nearly ten years ago, in the city of Chicago, heard these words pronounced in the national Republican convention by one who has been chosen to the Presidency:

> The reform in the civil service, auspiciously begun under the Republican Administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system already established by law to all the grades of the service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all Executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the object of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectually discontinued.

I myself, in 1888, heard those words fall from the lips of William McKinley. When you nominated him two years ago as your candidate for the Presidency you knew precisely what his position was. When we elected him upon the Republican platform we knew precisely what his position was; there was no doubt as to that. And I say that it would be a double treason—treachery to the man whom we selected, and whose views we knew upon this question: treachery to the great party to which we belong, and which had for a generation declared the same way—if to-day we falter in our support of this principle.

Mr. Chairman, in the light of these facts, in the light of the declarations of our parties and of the positions of our Presidents, I have listened with a good deal of astonishment to the course of this debate. We have heard the old spoils system proclaimed here in all its pristine and original corruption, and as vigorously as it was ever pronounced or put in practice by Andrew Jackson. The general movement in our politics for the last twenty-five years for the restoration of the ancient principles of our Government and for a return to the practices of the founders of the Constitution have been disregarded. The wide range of the debate makes it necessary to revert not merely to these early teachings, but to some of the primary notions of popular government. When George Washington was put at the head of the Government there may have been factions, but there were no parties, and it was one of the public sorrows of that great man that he could not check the tendency, so certain and so irresistible in popular governments, to the formation of parties.

John Adams succeeded to the office and the political views of George Washington, and the first appearance of political parties in their full development was during his term. Thomas Jefferson was elected President after a contest as heated as any political contest we wage to-day. His friends demanded to be recognized with offices. They said that they had been excluded from the government, and they demanded that the incumbents of the offices should be removed and that they be put in their places.

Thomas Jefferson wrote—and I commend this to our Democratic friends who make him the patron saint of their party—a letter to Dr. Rush about three weeks after his inauguration, and he declared that his party should come in for the vacancies that might occur until something like an equilibrium between the parties should be restored, but that he would not create vacancies for the purpose of filling them with his supporters. "Of the thousands of officers, therefore," said he, "in the United States, a very few individuals, probably not twenty, will be removed, and those only for doing what they ought not to have done. I know that in stopping thus short in the career of removals I shall give great offense to many of my friends. That torrent will be pressing me heavily, but my maxim is 'Fiat justitia, ruat cælum.'" In his eight years of office he made only thirty-nine removals.

In Madison's Administration there were but five removals, in Monroe's eight, and in John Quincy Adams's two. So that during the first forty years of this Government, of men holding office there were removed only about sixty, all told, and a committee of this House, which carefully investigated the facts, reported that during these forty years not a single man was removed from office on account of his political views. Then Jackson came in. He had a verbal record upon this question. No man had uttered more lofty declarations against the evils of patronage than he. One of the last things he did as Senator from Tennessee was to introduce an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting a second term to the President, in order to avoid the misuse of the offices. He was finally elected after two very warm contests. His passions were aroused. He was a man who believed a political enemy was a personal foe. He had plenty of bad and interested advisers, although his hot zeal needed no kindling. He made indiscriminate removals and looted the public service in a way that has made him the envy and despair of every spoilsman from that day to this.

His course was condemned by the greatest and purest statesmen of both parties living at that time. Henry Clay condemned it. He said that course followed out would destroy popular government and establish a despotism. Daniel Webster condemned it. Calhoun condemned it, and it was not supported by any prominent man who is to-day known as a statesman.

Jackson's doctrine was as forcibly stated by Swartwout, of New York, as by Marcy. He declared soon after Jackson was elected that "no damned rascal who tried to keep Adams in and Jackson out was entitled to the least mercy from that Administration save that of hanging." Swartwout well illustrated in his own person the new system then inaugurated. He was made collector of the port of New York and promptly proceeded to make way not only with his own salary but with the public money of the Government.

The proscription put in practice by Jackson invited counter proscription from the other party, so that as the Administrations alternated from that time until the time of the civil war, each Administration tried to get even with the one that had preceded it. And yet an attempt was made by some Administrations to do away with the spoils system. Daniel Webster was one of its conspicuous opponents, and when he was Secretary of State he addressed a letter, dated March 22, 1841, to Mr. St. Clair Clarke and other gentlemen, who were upon a commission which the President had appointed to make certain inquiries in regard to the service, in which he laid down these instructions for the guidance of the commissioners. He said:

> If you have any reason to suppose that anyone has been guilty of misconduct, you will state the charge to him and give him an opportunity to answer it, and will report no evidence of which the party shall not have had notice. You will inquire into no man's political opinions or preferences, but if it be alleged that any person having the power of employing and dismissing laborers has used that power, either in employing or dismissing, with any reference to the political opinions of those who may have been employed or dismissed, or for any political or party objection whatever, or in any way violated his duty for party or electioneering purposes, you will inquire into the truth of such suggestion.

Let us, then, get the spirit of our own history. Omitting the terms of Lincoln and Johnson, when the great upheaval of the civil war and the stupendous problems which followed it rendered a thought of this reform out of the question, we find the spirit of our first forty years against the spoils idea, and the last thirty years characterized by an earnest effort on the part of all parties to return to the earlier and better practices of the fathers of the Constitution.

So, I ask you which example is the more commanding—that of Washington and Jefferson and Adams and Madison, of Grant and Garfield and Hayes and McKinley, illustrating and adorning seventy years of our national life, or the proscription of Jackson, followed by the counter proscription of his successors, covering only thirty years of our existence and denounced by the greatest statesmen of that era?

It has been denied by the opponents of this law that it has had an effect to increase the efficiency or economy of the service. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON] has produced an array of figures which are as imposing as they are irrelevant. He points out that since this law was enacted in 1883 there has been an increase of some forty-odd thousand offices in the Government, but he does not state that of that increase at least 25,000 are taken up by fourth-class post-offices not under the rules, and of the balance of increase a great deal occurred before different branches of the service were put under the civil-service law.

Mr. PEARSON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. McCALL. Certainly.

Mr. PEARSON. Does not the gentleman know that originally the law included only the four classes, the classes set out in section 163 of the Revised Statutes? Now, there were 5,650 of these men included in 1883. In this same class to-day you will find 9,400 men. Therefore, your act requires 9,000 men to do the work performed by 5,000 prior to 1883.

Mr. McCALL. I do not derive any such lesson from the figures I offer. The gentleman from North Carolina and I can not very well solve a complicated arithmetical question in the presence of the House. But, Mr. Chairman, it is my belief that an investigation of the figures I shall now give to the House will show that they are absolutely correct.

Take the departmental service in Washington. In 1883 there were 7,847 officers in the unclassified service. In 1896, of offices which in 1883 had been unclassified—although in the meantime some of them had been added to the classified service—there were 10,760, an increase of nearly 50 per cent; and there was an increase in salaries of from $3,700,000 to $9,700,000. Of offices which were subject in 1883 to competitive examination, there were 5,530; and in these same classes, and doing the same work, there were in 1896 5,414 officers, showing an absolute decrease; and there was also a decrease of about $100,000 in salaries.

Mr. PEARSON. The gentleman is perfectly fair; I know he only wants the truth brought out. Therefore I ask him, Will he accept the figures of the commissioners themselves as published in their thirteenth annual report?

Mr. McCALL. Well, Mr. Chairman, there are a great many figures published in this annual report——

Mr. PEARSON. I refer to the figures on page 98.

Mr. McCALL. I do not have them in my mind, or a tithe of them; but I give this as my conclusion as to what I believe an investigation of the facts will show.

There are two departments in Washington to which the civil-service rules have not applied at all. Let us see what is the fact with regard to those departments. In the judicial branch there were in 1883 6 employees and in 1896 89 employees, while the salaries paid increased from $15,000 to $114,500.

But I come now to the most striking figures. In the legislative branch of the Government, which is not now and never has been subject to the civil-service rules, there were in 1883 154 officers and employees of the Senate; in 1896 the number had increased to 326—being more than double. The salaries paid had increased from $276,000 to $432,000. In the House the number of employees in 1883 was 197 and in 1896 591, while the amount of salaries paid had increased from $364,000 to $624,000. Thus we see precisely what was the effect of the influence of Senators and Representatives upon the public service here, those officers whom it is proposed to have dictate appointments for the entire service. While there was practically no increase in the work, there was a doubling of the number of employees and a doubling of the amount of salaries.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the gentleman include the members' clerks?

Mr. McCALL. I did not include them.

Mr. PEARSON. Is not that the principal item of increase?

Mr. McCALL. I am mistaken; they are included in the computation, but that makes no material difference in the controversy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see what has been the experience of the people of England. I know it may offend the sensibilities of some gentlemen to allude to England. That country and its history more generally serve the uses of a "punching bag" in order that political athletes may make popular displays of their political muscle just before an election. But it seems to me that it can not be entirely out of place for us to consider an experiment made in another civilized nation, and especially a nation of a kindred race with ourselves and having substantially the same institutions and laws. Let us see, therefore, what has been the course of things among a people in which our institutions grew up and were developed for our use. We do not need to go back very far before we find that the great dockyards of England were used in precisely the same way that our navy-yards have been used; that great activity was displayed in those dockyards just before a parliamentary election in order to secure the return of candidates favorable to the government.

Gentlemen will remember the famous statement of a custom-house officer in the time of King James II. He had been commanded by His Majesty to do what he could to elect candidates for Parliament favorable to the government; and he replied, "I have fourteen reasons for obeying the command of His Majesty—a wife and thirteen young children." We find that political pressure was exercised in England; that the offices were used for the purpose of influencing popular verdicts precisely as they have been in America. Nearly everything in the nature of public office—whether offices of the church or offices of the army or in the public service—was used for the purpose of influencing elections or used purely as a matter of personal patronage. Two hundred years ago they used to sell these offices, or if a nobleman had some broken-down retainer whom he wished to look out for, he would put him upon the Government. If he had a church living at his disposal, he would quite likely confer it upon his steward or his huntsman.

But the people of England were all the time making a struggle to wrest these privileges from the hands of the few. That is one of the great contests that mark the glorious history of that people. First one privilege went to the wall and then another. Finally, in 1855, against the protest of the privileged classes in England, one of whom, the Duke of Newcastle, was quoted in this debate the other day, the people of that country, under the leadership of men who were thoroughly imbued with the spirit of free institutions and with the ideas of a free government—men like William E. Gladstone and John Bright—finally wrested this last remaining privilege from the hands of the few and took the offices to themselves. Let me read to you what Mr. Gladstone said:

> In order that the public service might be indeed the public service—in order that we might not have among the civil officers of the State that which we had complained of in the army—viz, that the service was not the property of the nation, but of the officers—we have now been enabled to remove the barriers of nomination, patronage, jobbing, favoritism in whatever form; and every man belonging to the people of England if he so pleases to fit his children for the position of competing for places in the public service, may do it entirely irrespective of the question, What is his position in life or the amount of means with which he may happen to be or not to be blessed?

That was spoken by Mr. Gladstone when he was prime minister of England, and I say the same thing is beginning to be illustrated in this country. Instead of all the offices being the property of the few, instead of being used by individuals for the purpose of party advantage or for the purpose of their own advancement, a large number of them have been given to the people, and every man and woman in this country stands an equal opportunity of entering the public service upon the basis of merit alone.

Mr. PEARSON. That will be after the present 55,000 people are dead who are already on the eligible list.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, it is a fact without doubt that those who are disappointed in getting office are more potent forces in politics than those who are actually in office. My friend from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON]—and this is one of the fallacies that we have seen exhibited in all the arguments on that side of the case—my friend from North Carolina very plausibly holds out to the people the idea that this Civil Service Commission is all that stands between them and the offices. They know perfectly well that there is not one office for every twenty men who desire it. The question is, How shall that office be apportioned? We say that the best way, the fairest way to do it, so far as the applicant is concerned, is to open it up to all American citizens, and certainly that is the best way for the country, because it gets rid of a source of great corruption in our politics.

Mr. PEARSON. We claim that you shut both the front door and the back door and shut Democrats on the inside. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCALL. Well, now, Mr. Chairman, I will consider that statement of the gentleman. I do not regard the career of Grover Cleveland with unmixed admiration, and even those who do must admit that he has displayed thrift as a reformer, and that he has triumphantly restrained his apostolic zeal until very late in his term of service [laughter], and then has extended the rules——

Mr. PEARSON. We agree with you there.

Mr. McCALL. Has extended the rules when such extension would not have the effect of hampering him, but might make his successor good. But he was only in the Presidency two terms, and he accomplished great work—for a reformer, he accomplished a great work in the way of equalizing the offices between the parties. But suppose we stop to-day. Suppose we say, if we can fairly stop this contest for the offices, we will let the old régime go by. Let us see how the offices stand to-day in this country. There can be no doubt that in 1883, when this law went into effect, all the national civil offices in the country were held by Republicans. Then look at the extension of the rules.

Take even the Government Printing Office, which Mr. Cleveland put under the civil-service rules, and with regard to which there has been so much declamation here. It appears that at the time these rules were applied there were 1,200 appointees of Mr. Palmer, Republican, and only 800 appointees of Mr. Benedict, Democrat. There were probably 50 per cent more Republicans than Democrats. Then trace through these different extensions from time to time, and I venture to say that in the classified service to-day you will find at least 20 per cent, if not 30 per cent, more Republicans than Democrats.

Mr. PEARSON rose.

Mr. McCALL. Now, if the gentleman will permit me to develop my point (because he has led me away from the point of my argument), how are the people of this country divided politically? They are about equally divided. If we are going to cry a halt upon using the public offices as spoils, we should cry a halt when the offices are nearly equally divided between the two parties. But the Republican party to-day has not merely 25 per cent more than its share of the classified offices, but it has nearly 100,000 of the unclassified offices which it can use as spoils.

Mr. PEARSON. Will the gentleman refer to his authority for that statement.

Mr. McCALL. Well, the authority for that statement rests in the whole list.

Mr. PEARSON. Just for a moment. How many of the 31,000 men that Mr. Cleveland put in under that order alleged to have been made on May 6, but really made on January 12 following—how many of that 31,000 men and women are not Democrats?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. McCALL. I should like a little extension.

Mr. PEARSON. I am sorry to have been the cause of the gentleman not completing his argument.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts be allowed to conclude his remarks.

Mr. MOODY. Make a definite time.

Mr. McCALL. I will conclude inside of fifteen minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I ask, then, that the gentleman be allowed fifteen minutes in which to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts be allowed fifteen minutes additional. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCALL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will say in reply to the question of my friend from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON] that if we proceed alone upon the basis that every branch of the service which was included in the successive Executive orders had at the time of the promulgation of each order no one in it but those holding the politics of the President making the order, and if he will trace the successive steps, he will find that probably a majority of the men in the classified service to-day are Republicans. It is not a very long computation to make, and I would ask my friend to make it.

I was saying that it was not a fact that the offices to which these different extensions applied were in every instance filled by men in sympathy with the President making the order. I instanced a particular department concerning which there has been more criticism upon this floor than concerning any other department. That is the Public Printing Office. I instanced that to show that there were more appointees of the Republican Public Printer in it at that time than of the Democrat.

Mr. PEARSON. I understand that at the present time there are about four or five hundred Republicans in the Public Printing Office, and that about twenty-six hundred of those employees in the Public Printing Office are Democrats—about in that proportion.

Mr. McCALL. Well, I do not know where my friend gets his figures, I am sure.

Mr. PEARSON. I get them from the Public Printer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I want to ask the gentleman if the Public Printer's well-known prejudice in favor of the civil-service law may not bias those figures?

Mr. PEARSON. The gentleman speaks so rapidly that I did not catch everything he said.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Is it not highly probable that the well-known bias of the Public Printer in favor of the spirit and letter of the civil-service law might bias those figures, so that they are not entirely reliable?

Mr. PEARSON. I suppose he is capable of speaking the honest truth, notwithstanding the fact that he is a Republican, and I know he has the right to have a desire to stand by his party and his party friends.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I suppose the gentleman intended that as an answer to my question.

Mr. McCALL. In order that I may conclude what I have to say, I will simply say with reference to this statement that, admitting that there are only 400 Republicans in the Public Printing Office, which I am quite sure is a ridiculously low estimate, if you carry the computation through the different extensions you will still find that a majority of the offices in the classified service are held by Republicans.

Mr. Chairman, I was alluding to the civil service of England. It was alleged against the reform there that no one but college graduates would have an opportunity, the same allegation that we hear made in this country. Very early in the operation of that law a classification was made of some 390 men who had passed the examination.

It was found that of those 390 men a very large proportion were the sons of tradesmen and artisans, classes that before that time had been not very largely represented in the public service, classes representing the people, and that only 8 of those 390 were graduates of colleges. And with reference to those who passed the examinations under our own law, we find that over 80 per cent were graduates of our public schools, and that only 10 per cent had ever graduated from college.

The gentleman from North Carolina, who always entertains the House—I refer to the colleague of my friend on my right—taunted the gentleman from Indiana with the statement that if the gentleman from Indiana should go into one of the Departments the clerks there would regard him very much as they would an ordinary mortal—that there would be no sensation shown by the clerks at their desks when the gentleman from Indiana approached. Now, I wondered what it was that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] desired. I suppose that it would be more in harmony with his idea of the simplicity of republican government that the clerks of the Department, when a mighty Congressman should come near them, should proceed to grovel. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. In behalf of the clerks of the Departments, I will say, since my name has been suggested in that connection, that their behavior is not at all different now to the behavior with which I have always been treated outside of the Departments.

Mr. McCALL. Always as a gentleman. I simply desire to say in regard to that that the gentleman from North Carolina, it seemed to me, in the extravagance of his satire, has shown one of the benefits of this system. It shows that a man who holds a Government office is not of necessity, as James Madison said in regard to the effect of the tenure-of-office act, a sycophant of his member of Congress or his Senator. The clerks of the Departments are American citizens. Certainly they are the political equals, and in occasional instances they are the personal equals, of members of Congress, and it seems to me it is a tribute in favor of this system that they can hold office and at the same time retain their self-respect. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there are a great many things which I desired to call to the attention of the House to which I shall not have an opportunity to allude. If our letters are to be carried and elevators run by officers who have the political views of the party in power, it seems to me that there is no reason why this idea should not be extended to all the functions of government. There is money in the offices, but there is also money in contracts. Why should not our ships, when a Republican Administration is in power, be built by Republicans? Why are not Government contracts as fair a spoils for the party patriot? There is no logical stopping place short of a prostitution of all ends of government to the personal advantage of the people who happen at the time to be in control. The one idea underlying it is simply this, that government is an instrumentality by which one set of people are enabled to plunder the rest of the people.

As my time is expiring, I will enumerate a few of the advantages of civil-service reform: In the first place, it secures a more efficient and economical public service. In the next place, it gives to all who desire to enter the service an equal opportunity through the open door of merit and takes away from the privileged few the power to pay their political debts with places in the people's service. It lessens the power of bossism and favoritism, already too strong in this country. It dries up most fruitful sources of angry political contentions.

It takes away from Congressmen executive powers which they have so long usurped and gives to them the time to perform the duties which are theirs under the Constitution and which they were elected to discharge. It preserves the independence of the legislative branch of the Government, which is destroyed if members of Congress and Senators are continually going to the White House and importuning the President for offices. I can show you more than one instance where appointments have been made for the purpose of pushing legislation through the two Houses of Congress. And then it secures to popular elections their real dignity and value, by enabling the people to express their will in the choice of political officers free from the corrupting influence of hundreds of thousands of placemen on the one hand and hundreds of thousands of place hunters on the other.

This is a question in which both sides of the House, aye, the whole American people, are interested. The Democrats believe that they have vital principles, and that if the people can fairly pass upon them they will pronounce in their favor, and that those policies and principles will be put in force for the benefit of the country. We believe also in the policies and principles which we advocate on this side. Let us then join hands and take away the corrupting influence of these thousands of nonpolitical offices, and then the policies which you represent and the policies which we represent can be submitted in the great constitutional forum and can be decided by a free and unbought expression of the will of the American people. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to enter into any discussion of the merits or demerits of the civil-service system, but simply ask for a moment or two to call attention of this House to what I deem to be a violation of the civil-service law and regulations. The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WARREN, I think it was) the other day, in talking about the law, and later some other gentlemen, attacked it on the ground that they could not remove the members of the pension boards of examining surgeons.

Now, it is a fact, and I suppose it is known to nearly every member of this House, that in many, if not all, of the large cities of the country where these boards are under the protection of the law a board No. 2 of examining surgeons has been appointed. It is a fact that since the appointment of these boards no examinations have been sent to boards No. 1 in any one of these cities. It is a further fact that these boards have been appointed without any examination, without any recommendation from the Civil Service Commission, and this in plain and open violation of the civil-service law.

All I choose to say at this time is this: If this law is to remain on the statute books, then it, like every other law, ought to be enforced. And I take this occasion to call the attention of the House to the fact that this is a plain, open, and intentional violation of the law. This, of course, could not be done without the knowledge of the Secretary of the Interior, who has control of it, and it seems to me that the President of the United States, if he means to stand by the message that he has sent to this House, should not wink at such a violation of the law as this.

Whatever may be the dissensions and divisions among the members of this House on that side of the Chamber, surely the President can prevent members of his own official family from thus violating both the letter and the spirit of the law he has so lately told us has his unqualified approval.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, this is a subject which seems to me to be of too great public importance to be tinged by any personal rancor. Let us look at the practical facts. There are 87,000 offices under the civil-service law. The proposition made to this House by many members, some of one party and some of the other, is that these 87,000 employees, their salaries amounting to $100,000,000 a year, shall be placed under the control of Congress or other political district control.

The proposition can have no other meaning; short terms of office mean the same thing. It may be said that the power of appointment is going back to the President, where the Constitution placed it; but the number of offices in this country is now so great that the President can not make appointments to them all. Seventy-five postmasters were appointed by George Washington. There are 70,000 at the present time. The population of the country has increased about twenty-five times, while the number of postmasters has increased nearly one thousand times. And the same increase has taken place in other branches of the Government—in the Indian service, the Patent Office, the various branches of the Interior, the Library, the Treasury, the secret service, and the customs service. It is an increase that has accompanied the modern extension of the powers of government in taxation, tariff, finance, police, and every direction. It seems unavoidable.

The growth of offices has been such that to-day there is actually in this country one United States officer for every 100 grown men. After you take out the judiciary, officers of the Army and Navy, postmasters (which, being local, are left really to the will of the locality), and mere laborers, there are still left 87,000 employees who must be appointed, but who are now shielded from the power of political patronage by the civil-service law.

Now, that was not always so. As young as some of us are, we remember when it was not so. And we recall what took place, when hundreds and thousands of men went into the navy-yards just before election, and went out just after election. We recall the character of the appointments. It is true that those in Washington and especially in the Treasury Department were carefully made and not confirmed unless appointees were fit to do their duty; but how about the Indian agents, Western post-office agents and inspectors—what sort were these?

When it was a matter of political patronage, men were sent into the West and what corruption did you not afterwards hear of? It was cheating Indians out of their food and cheating the country in the carriage of mails. We all remember it and more. We remember that when a man got an office he was expected to work for the party or to contribute to the campaign fund of the party, or both. If a poor man got an office, or a poor woman was fortunate enough to get one, both had to contribute to the political fund of the party out of their salary, and the salaries paid by the Government were used for the protection of whatever party happened to be in power.

We all know it. We know more. Divided among the districts, the salaries through the United States would be $300,000 to each district every year. Ten per cent of that would be $30,000, and 5 per cent $15,000. That is what some Congressmen want to control. Yet we are told that we should return to the old system in order to get rid of the rich men in Congress. That is not all. There are 2,000 men employed in the New York custom-house. Their salaries are over $2,000,000, and these gentlemen want the control of the New York custom-house, with its patronage of $2,000,000 a year.

In 1881, by the contest between patronage and the President, the great State of New York lost two Senators, one of them the Senator whom we looked up to as the incarnation of Republican strength.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. BRUMM. You say that two Senators were lost by reason of the conflict between the President and the patronage system. The question I want to ask is, would not that all be cured by your people voting as earnestly as you do for this measure for an amendment to the Constitution giving the people the power to elect the Senators?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I am not dealing with ifs and possibilities, but with the Constitution as it is. Do not keep me away from the line of my argument with such a question as that. I am charging that the loss of the Senators from New York was due to the desire for patronage.

The conflict which lost that State two of its Senators did more. It almost disrupted the United States. It caused a public excitement, in which a crank, disappointed in office seeking, shot down the President. It was then that men of all parties resolved that this system should come to an end.

The blood of Garfield spoke to the people of the United States in 1881, and within two years they had placed upon the statute books a law which said that the principle of civil service should be extended even to the New York custom-house with its 2,000 employees, and that this system of political patronage, employment by districts, should come to an end in favor of a merit system.

Now, I am not going to say that the system which was adopted has worked entirely well. I believe that the Presidents who issued their proclamations, although tardy, were in earnest. The man who has the responsibility of the Government of the United States usually ends by being in earnest. I believe that the commissioners were in earnest. The man who is now our Assistant Secretary of the Navy and the man now at the head of the Civil Service Commission are thoroughly in earnest. I believe they were opposed. Some gentlemen on our side did not then believe in this system. Many gentlemen on the other side were always against it. The love of power is always against it. Most of the gentlemen on the other side of the House come to us now with a free offer: "Sweep this system away and we will take our chances of getting control of the offices of the United States."

That is their offer. Gentlemen on this side of the House, do you want to take the wooden horse? Is it a system that will help or hurt an honest party—that gives most power to the honest partisan who tries to keep good men in office without taxation or to the ringster who takes money or services as he can get them? I ask you, will you put the Democratic saddle upon the Republican horse?

I say this law had its enemies. They bored holes in it. The law says that after an examination the offices shall be filled by selection according to grade from the highest on the list; but instead of filling them by selection according to grade from the highest on the list—which means that in making the selection they should first take No. 1, then No. 2, then No. 3—they filled them by nominating three persons and allowing the head of the Department to select which one he pleased from those three—perhaps for political reasons. I am told that sometimes in the Treasury Department successive lists of three have been rejected until they got to the name that they wanted.

Again, the law says that promotion shall be from one step to another and upon examination. But instead of having a competitive examination to test each man's work, and abilities, they have had a mere pass examination. It is easy enough, if I walk from one of these rows of seats to another, and another, and then another, to pass the whole line. Men were promoted by grade to the chief positions, their fellows being hopped over. For instance, a man would enter as a laborer without an examination, and then would jump through the remaining grades like a man at checkers, until he landed as king in the last row.

That is the way the party in power dealt with the civil-service law. And then they delayed its application to various departments, and meanwhile, as we are told, they turned out old soldiers, turned out people who were in, and then, after putting in others, put the shield of the law over them. There were continual violations of law—a disposition not to abide by it. Can a party which thus cheats the law be trusted with its execution? Look at the victory of Tammany in the city of New York; look at the wholesale removals of everybody up to boards of education that have already taken place in that city since January 1.

I do not say this to accuse those who are opposed to me. There has been too much abuse in this debate. I only say that those who propose the repeal of this law are those who know their business and believe that the repeal will give them a bigger prize to clutch in case of victory at the polls and more to fight for. Under the doctrine of patronage the "outs" always have the advantage over the "ins," because the "ins," out of mere decency, must reappoint, while the "outs" go in to get the game.

Mr. BRUMM. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I have very little time left, but if the gentleman will ask his question promptly, let him go ahead.

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman has spoken of the rule of Tammany and its results. I want to ask him whether the mugwumps of New York are not more responsible for the Tammany victory than all other parties put together? And this civil-service humbug was their great principle.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I accuse nobody. But I do not think splits in parties are good things. What I wish to say is this, that instead of political patronage giving strength to a party, it is the rock upon which parties split. It is the rock upon which parties in the city of New York have split.

Mr. BRUMM. Nobody but the mugwumps split upon it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It is the rock upon which parties in other States of this country seem to have split. It is the rock on which Garfield's Administration split and which later brought in a Democratic Administration. Patronage is not to be trusted as the strength of a party. Political patronage—the right to administer in each district $300,000 worth of annual salaries, and, if need be, to displace 250 men, is a power that does not and ought not to belong to members of a legislature. It is arbitrary power which belongs neither to the members of Congress nor to the President nor to the whole nation. The nation has to be governed by law. The power of patronage is corrupting.

I have compared the Departments and their reputation in the old days with what it is now. Let gentlemen answer—do not our Departments hold a higher reputation for honesty than they did in the days of Credit Mobilier? I ask you, even in the few years since so many offices have been put under the control of the civil service, if the general tone of Congress has not improved, I can say for myself that whatever I may formerly have heard of Congress, I am now proud of my associates, and I know not one whom I will not trust.

But I do not trust human nature. Given the case that the President has to appoint without rule, and he will appoint on the recommendation of his friend from that district. Given that power of appointment, that power of political patronage which now exists as to post-offices—although I do not know that in that case it does any particular harm, because post-offices are local—given that power, and it is too much temptation for human nature. The man who has that power of recommendation can not help using it for political purposes. He can not help wanting to remove the man who is useless to him, whether he is good for the Government or not.

Only one sentence more. I believe that these men who so rashly talk of abolishing the merit system, instead of improving and strengthening the service, make the mistake of their lives. I believe they forget history that is yet fresh in their memories and in their own experience. I believe that they are trying to replace in themselves a power of appointment, which was never given to them by the Constitution or intended to be given to members of a legislature.

I believe that they unintentionally urge a course that would corrupt the springs of politics, that they run the risk of making this body a body of place hunters and place rulers instead of a body of statesmen. I believe they weaken the sinews of any honest party, be it Republican or Democratic, and that they strengthen the power of the forces of evil, be they called Republican or Democratic, Tammany or Bryanist, the forces that seek not to make laws, but to get offices. [Applause.]

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, the bombardment that the civil-service law and the Civil Service Commission have received from the brains in this House leads me to query whether he who interferes with the remains at this late hour in the discussion will not be liable to prosecution under the statute which prohibits cruelty to animals. [Laughter.] The hypocrisy and iniquity of this commission have been thoroughly exposed, and the duty that I have to perform is a very simple one, one that is usually assigned to kids in the section of country from which I come, namely, raking after the cart.

To avoid repeating what has been said by others so much better than I could possibly say it, and to bridle my tongue, lest, if I should undertake to describe this commission and the iniquities that it has perpetrated under that law, in the words of the present Assistant Secretary of the Navy, my utterances might be unfit to print, I am going to attempt, for the first time in my life, to talk from notes. It may be a failure, but I do not know of any better place on earth to fail than right here. [Laughter.] If opposition to the methods by which appointments are made to the civil service, and opposition to the civil-service law itself, make a man a spoilsman, then I am a spoilsman, without any mental reservation or evasion whatsoever. [Applause.]

If during my remarks I may chance to refer to my civil-service friends by calling them pet names it will be in a kindly, loving, and Christian spirit, friendly like that which prompts them to call me a "spoilsman." I shall do it to distinguish them from the common herd, of which I am one, and dignify and class them as their rank and contentions demand. [Laughter.]

I believe the Government belongs to its friends. It should be managed and operated by its friends in every department. [Applause.] They who are responsible and accountable for results, and they only, should participate in working out results.

I am proud to be known as a spoilsman, and still prouder of the fact that the party to which I belong has within its ranks men qualified and worthy to fill every position in every department of our Government.

I believe it is the duty of an Administration to prefer its friends always, at all times, to its enemies, for each and every position in its power to fill. Men who think alike should work together. It owes its existence to the labors and efforts of its friends; they won for it all the patronage at its disposal. Only baseness and ingratitude could induce action that should take from the victors the fruits they won and distribute them among their foes. He who attempts it will lose the confidence and respect of those who gave him the position he occupies, be it high or low. [Applause.]

I am in favor of the immediate and unconditional repeal of the civil-service law. [Applause.] It was conceived in iniquity and born of hypocrisy, has been administered infamously, and is sustained by cowardice and demagogy. It has been construed in a manner never dreamed of by its authors, and enlarged by despotic orders without a shadow of authority in law, until it is hated, despised, loathed, and execrated by the intelligent people of this country, almost universally, regardless of party affiliations or views entertained on all other subjects. [Applause.]

It is un-American, unrepublican, antagonistic to all the history and traditions of our party. The construction given to it by those in power, the methods which it tolerates, and the results it produces outrage the sentiments and feelings of all men who believe in a republican form of government by and for the people.

It denies to the active, efficient, worthy, and competent patriotic citizen all opportunity to participate as an agent or servant in the employ of the Government.

It builds up an aristocracy of officeholders with life tenure unless transferred to the penitentiary, who, experience has shown, are totally unfit for the positions they occupy; generally selected because they lack capacity to earn a livelihood in competition with their fellows, and are pensioned onto the Government to be cared, for through life, as barnacles attach themselves to a ship, not having energy and capacity enough to move with their own unaided efforts. [Laughter.]

I am for the repeal of this law because I believe the public weal demands it, because I see no other way in which the many thousand worthless drones and good-for-nothing employees in the public service, who render no adequate service for the money they are drawing from the Treasury, can be got rid of.

I know of no way, so long as this nuisance act remains in force [laughter], by which faithful, active, competent men, such as the Rupublican party has always when in power given to the civil service, can get there until this mother of deadbeats is wiped out, and meritorious, deserving men enter into the places now occupied by the litter hatched, almost always, from bad eggs. [Laughter.] We owe it to ourselves, our friends, and the country. The good name of our party and its past history demand it. Republicans everywhere are expecting it; they demand immediate action.

Every hour that we permit the unjust and iniquitous orders of Grover Cleveland to remain in force unrevoked when we have the power to wipe them out, 10,000 steam shovels are digging the grave of the Republican party. [Applause.] And every man who has any conception of the sentiment and feelings of the voters of this country knows it, if he is so constituted that he can know anything. [Laughter.]

For one, I am unwilling that our party shall be sacrificed and led to the slaughter by a few mugwumps who belong to no party, are deadly parasites upon any to which they attach themselves. [Applause.] The Democrats have no quarters for them; we ought not to have. Let them camp out this winter.

If they have no quarters, I will wire some farmer in my district to send a hay cap that will inclose ample space for them all, and if they have no provisions, I will ask him to ship a farrow cow. She will afford all the nourishment they can use, and they will have milk to sell instead of offices to distribute. It will make a slight change in their occupation. [Laughter.] I have no sympathy whatever with those who apologize for the original enactment because, as they say, its authors understood that it could at most apply to but a few in number; that is no justification. It was absolutely wrong in principle, whether it was intended to be applied to ten or ten thousand officeholders. [Applause.]

The evil results might be mitigated by lessening the number of beneficiaries under the act; but so long as one employee of the Government in any single Department to which this statute is applicable is given a life tenure, and millions of citizens excluded therefrom, whose capacity and ability are equal and superior to his—can by a mere order of a President like Cleveland, who, when he issued some of the decrees, blanketing in for life his friends and excluding all other men, had not supporters enough to elect a moderator in a single school district meeting in the United States—so long, I say, as there remains on our statutes a law that permits such gross injustice to our constituents, which deprives the worthy and meritorious of all opportunity to participate as employees in the service of the Government, so long will Congress be guilty, and must stand adjudged guilty, of the crime, as I view it, of attempting to revolutionize this Government, deprive the citizens thereof of the rights enjoyed by them from its foundation; and, aping English lords and nobles, build up a so-called aristocracy of officeholders, who as a rule have not brains, energy, or capacity enough to earn a living in competition with those who are excluded from employment in the Government service.

If it is thought best to make the Departments of the Government in the city homes, hospitals, and asylums for such as are now here under the merit system, so called, in the name of God and humanity I ask that once in four years the unfortunates who are outside the breastworks and off the pay roll may have an opportunity to compete with those on the inside and on the pay roll by being examined by disinterested, competent persons other than mugwumps, for it may happen in the chapter of accidents or providence of God that some outside may be found more useless, worthless, and shiftless than some one on the inside, and if that be so, he ought to be recognized and crowned as winner and his name placed on the pay roll under the merit system.

Let us act as becomes broad-gauge statesmen on this great question, affecting as it does the rights of our constituents, and if "by our works we are to be known," let whoever looks at one of the specimens I have described, in any bureau or department of the Government, think as he admires him that he won the position that he occupies through the merit system; that the vulgar influence of a spoilsman contributed not one little bit in elevating him to the proud position of a salary grabber in his country's hospital.

There was nothing in his borning, nothing that he had ever done or will do. He played fair, dealt squarely, and won it through the merit system as the most useless, worthless, and good-for-nothing individual under the American flag for any business purposes.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] gave a reason for continuing this law or a similar one that I never had heard suggested before. He says such a law is necessary in order to prevent men from mortgaging their souls for place. Well, I knew that these mugwumps would do anything for place. I knew they would sell their voice, their influence. I had heard it said they would sell their votes. I never knew before that it was possible that they could induce anybody else to believe that they had such articles as souls. Why, my friends, think of attending a mortgagee sale of a mugwump's soul. What under heaven would the auctioneer describe it to be? [Laughter.]

I think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] struck the keynote to the situation when he said, in substance—I will not quote—that the name given to the system, "merit system," and so often repeated, has led some people who are not familiar with the manner appointments are made to think there may be merit in it.

I do not think the shallow, cheap humbuggery, the hypocrisy, and deceitfulness of these charlatans has ever been exposed. Mankind almost universally abhors them, and ignores them and their teachings as unclean things. Here and there an editor, whose principal subsistence comes from blackmail, gives them a passing notice, and another class of editors, always hostile to the Republican party, but powerless to injure it, urge the Administration and party to continue on the line of civil service, knowing that such action means suicide.

These eunuchs in politics pretend to desire to improve the personnel of the service, and therefore insist that all who are out of the service shall pass an examination which shall evidence their literary ability and educational fitness, measured by a standard fixed by these squawmen in politics, as a test of qualification for the position desired, which, if passed successfully, entitles the applicant to a position for life, and gives him priority over all other American citizens solely because he has a certificate from a committee of mugwumps.

Nothing more is required. Nothing could better illustrate the hypocrisy and cheap deception of these men than the fact that all examinations end just where there is need of education or peculiar training and experience. I will, by permission, insert in the RECORD at this point in my remarks an exact copy of what is required of an applicant for each and every one of the positions named; what the examination is that is expected to demonstrate his ability, or lack of ability, to fill the positions or any one of them named. It is exactly the same for each and every one of the occupations, unless I have noted wherein it differs.

They always tell us that they are laboring to perpetuate this system in order to help the poor farmer boy on the hillside. I know all about the poor farmer boy on the hillside, for I was one. I was poor then, and have held my own admirably in that respect ever since. I could sympathize with all that if there was anything in it. Now, in these examinations there is one test, the spelling of twenty simple words in ordinary use around the farm. Are they such words as "man," "hen," "dog," "cat," "cow?" No, they are not so hard as that, for there is an inspector in the service under this law at one of the stock yards who, every time he makes his report to the Commissioner of Agriculture spells cow and car with a "k." [Laughter.]

No doubt he is a competent man who can tell when a cow has the horn ail or pleuro-pneumonia, but it shows the shallow humbuggery, the imposition, and the fraud that they attempt to practice upon the American people by this formula of examinations. It embraces simple tests in addition and subtraction. I fancy a man coming up to Mr. Procter, the chairman, to be examined. Mr. Procter says, "How many fingers on that hand?" "Four." "Right." And Mr. Procter's eyes begin to sparkle. Now, he says, "I inclose two of them, how many of them are there left?" "Two." "Correct." Then, turning to his associate commissioners, he says, "Give this man a certificate to go into the Government service for life, as a farrier. He has displayed excellent qualities for shoeing a kicking mule." [Laughter.] There is still another test. He must be able to count United States money.

Well, Mr. Procter lays down a dime and a cart-wheel dollar. He says, "My friend, the Government of the United States has metallic money. One of these pieces is a 10-cent piece and the other is a cart-wheel dollar. Which is the cart-wheel dollar?" The candidate answers correctly, and then Mr. Procter says, "We have paper money, several varieties of it. Here are two samples. I have here now a piece of Continental money and a greenback. Tell me which is the greenback." He tells him, and Mr. Procter says, "Give this gentleman a certificate to go into the service for life as a detective in a subtreasury," which is one of the places for which this examination is made.

Then he is obliged to write "with his own hand." His best girl or his wife can not help him out. After the gentleman applicant writes, Mr. Procter looks at it and says: "Look at the line of beauty in that capital; give this applicant a certificate for dam tender for life," and sends him into the service. Looking over the writing a little further, he says, "He is also competent for knife grinder; certify him for a knife grinder for life. And if the dam gets away he will not be out of a job."

The parrot, educated pig, or 10-year-old boy that can spell twenty simple words, or a part of twenty, can add, subtract, multiply, and divide (a simple test), and can count United States money—mark the last qualification; that is to prevent his mugwump brother from robbing him when he is paid off—a very wise provision which evidences the tender solicitude of the commissioners for the protection of these superior but inexperienced squawmen who never earned or handled any United States money until they became pensioners of the United States under civil-service rules. The ridiculousness of this examination, to pass which gives the candidate a life tenure in office as a superior being, is enough to make a sphinx laugh itself hoarse with hiccoughs. He who was nimble of foot and got where he could endure the crucial test first wins not exactly an immortal crown, but a position for life, to the exclusion of all other Americans, because of his superior qualifications. This is christened by the political eunuch who invented it "the merit system."

What a libel on our 10-year-old schoolboys! What an insult to some thousand colored boys in this District to-day. An outrageous, infamous, hypocritical, deceitful attempt to impose upon the people an aristocracy of officeholders with life tenure, and exclude the bright, active, worthy, and deserving men and women from participating in the administering of the offices of this Government.

The matchless idiocy that presumes that any body of men can prescribe a formulae by which they can examine and judge of a man's fitness for one in every hundred of the places that are filled by appointment is too ridiculous to merit consideration. Every man of average intelligence knows that experience alone tests a man's capacity for any position. There are many educated fools that can spell "cow," that do not know how to milk. [Laughter.]

There are men who can pass the examination I have described for detectives who would steal postage stamps.

There are experienced, gifted men in every avocation of life who are superior in their line who could not account for the spots on the sun any better than they could for the ignorance of the examining board before whom they are being examined on subjects entirely foreign to their line of business. I have heard it said that somewhere in the South a bright colored boy was being examined for a position as letter carrier. The first question asked him was, "How far is it from the earth to the moon?" He exclaimed, "My God, massa, if you are going to put me on that route I will withdraw," took his hat, and left.

Many of the writers on agriculture who know all about the properties of the soil, are familiar with all that is known of chemistry and fertilizers, can tell exactly what constitutes a potato, kernel of corn, a grain of wheat, or a head of cabbage, would perhaps starve if they had only what with their own hands they could raise to feed upon.

One of the best lawyers that I ever met knew so little of human nature that he could seldom win a verdict at the hands of a jury. I fear he would have starved had he been forced to live on the amounts that he won in verdicts.

Let us follow one of these who has credentials for an office for life in his pocket. There are still some thorns in the pathway of this giant intellect of the nineteenth century.

He will enter upon the discharge of the duties of the office which the soul-tearing examination referred to has evidenced his capacity to fill when the hearse takes away from the Department the remains of one discharged by Providence, in violation of the rules and regulations of the civil service, without preferring charges. [Laughter and applause.]

In his anxiety to become an officeholder, not like spoilsmen are, but under the merit system, he thanks God that Providence is not yet under civil-service regulations. [Laughter.]

But there are some traces of humanity left in him yet; he has been partially born again, but he still hankers after what spoilsmen are willing to secure for those who were loyal to their party and convictions. He has submitted to the examination prescribed by these wise men, who assured him that they were experienced, expert midwives, who had attended professionally nearly 100,000 cases, every one of which was born alive, and their names were to be found in their books born out from among the common herd into the exalted companionship of those who preach the merit system and hold office by appointment. Aided by the experienced accoucheurs, he has made every effort in his power to corkscrew himself out of the womb of politics and away from vile men of the world who are known as politicians and make Administrations and wipe them out when the public weal demands it.

He has been vaccinated with mugwump virus for an office, by appointment, on the merit-system plan; so he sits at the gate with the Lazzaroni in politics, watches for the hearse, and wonders if a mugwump will ever die. [Laughter.]

He waits long, his hopes constantly failing, his faith growing smaller, as he thinks if it be true that death really loves a shining mark that he will never follow the track of a mugwump or squawman in politics. [Laughter.]

If heaven, like earth, abhors monstrosities, what use could death make of such a specimen, unless a single one might be desired to exhibit to Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, and Grant, that they might congratulate themselves that they made their escape from this planet before this species of parasite attached themselves to any political party in the United States?

A party that permits it is doomed in this world. I do not know what may be the fate of such in the next. This I do know: If our Civil Service Commission goes into business over there, and St. Peter should call on them for bookkeepers, gate tenders, detectives of treasury, night watchmen to patrol the golden streets, heaters, and melters, and they presented themselves duly certified as competent for the position, the old saint would exclaim, "My God, I have not seen such a gang as this since the day I was crucified. [Great laughter and applause.] I am not certain but these were there—some of them."

He had once met a eunuch who wanted to be baptized; he had never before been surrounded with such a bevy of eunuchs, each wanting an office, and expecting to obtain it on such credentials as those presented to him. [Laughter.]

These drillmasters of Providence and opponents of spoilsmen methods, when any other than their strikers are candidates for position, evidence to the world most beautifully that they are hypocrites and Pharisees by indorsing and sustaining the action of that matchless spoilsman, Grover Cleveland, who, when nearing the end of his Administration, scorned to make any discrimination between his supporters and gave to every one an office, some 50,000, blanketed them in for life, and went out of office leaving a few, only a few, places unfilled with his henchmen, not because he desired to do so, but for the reason that he had not quite friends enough to go round.

These wet and dry nurses of the merit system [laughter] when they oppose the repeal of a law under which so great an outrage upon the rights of all other American citizens was perpetrated stand before the world with these words emblazoned upon their foreheads, "Hypocrites" and "Pharisees," to be read by all men who see them and known by all men who hear of them.

Who are these pensioners for life upon the Government under what our squaw-men friends are pleased to call the merit system? Are they experts in any business? Are they capable of performing any service?

What have they, or any of them, ever done that endears them, to the exclusion of all other men, to these mugwumps—charlatans? One thing, and that only. They grabbed an office for life, and that commends them to the admiration of these eunuchs in politics, office by appointment and office for life being the only aim and ambition that a half-breed in politics ever had. No one of them was ever elected, or could be, hogreeve on such an issue. The American people have some self-respect.

It is a notorious fact, well known to all men to-day, that under the so-called merit system the Departments are filled, honeycombed, with worthless, useless, inefficient, and good-for-nothing employees, who are an actual hindrance to the proper performance of the public business.

They are absolutely destitute of capacity and ability to render any adequate service to the Government, upon which they have been pensioned for life as superior beings, selected by the test required to be used under the merit system. They have no sympathy with the aims and objects of the present Administration, implacable enemies, open and defiant, ready at all times, by all means, to contribute what they can to make it a failure and odious to the people. The presence of such in any bureau or department of the Government to-day is an injustice to the millions of men who made this Administration and are of right entitled to these positions.

To such proportions has this matchless fraud obtained that those who are responsible in some degree to the people for results in their Department have spoken, and already there has come to us through the public press, from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, the proposition or suggestion that we eliminate from those relied upon for actual service sixty or seventy of these good-for-nothing, useless, and other superannuated fossils by pensioning them at $900 per year each for life, and thereby make room for men who can and will render some service to the Government.

It will cost $63,000 a year to support these now on hand, first invoice under the merit system, in one Department of the Government, who are so useless and worthless in the service that the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury suggested this method of getting rid of them as a matter of economy, I suppose, notwithstanding the great burden that will be imposed upon us by so doing. He thinks it better, and I presume cheaper, than existing conditions. His suggestion was most timely, and called the attention of the country to the fruits which the so-called merit system has already borne.

It is the logical and inevitable result of such a practice, and was advocated by George W. Curtis in his communication to General Grant on the subject of civil service, and is the bed-rock position of all honest advocates of a genuine civil-service system, and obtains wherever that system is practiced. It is the creature of monarchical and despotic government, devised and designed to keep official position out of the hands and control of the people. It is the most dangerous foe that has ever yet threatened our democratic form of government, and unless it is destroyed will insidiously rob this people of the liberty they have heretofore possessed and the power to select and elect their officials and rulers.

In a short time, if we continue to increase the number of those having life tenure in office, as has been done the past two years, there will be a vast army of 200,000 or more drawing annually many millions from the Treasury of our country, beyond the reach of our people in power to remove, who will dictate to or defeat legislators and rule over those who are rulers to-day. I warn my countrymen, and especially those of my party, that if you consent to the encroachment upon and curtailment of the rights our people enjoy we shall be torn and scattered by a cyclone of public indignation, born of justice and love of liberty.

These appointees have a life tenure, and are subject to removal only after charges are preferred and a hearing is had. Neither sickness nor old age constitute an offense or crime, and therefore are not a cause for removal. It must be remembered that there are seven other Departments of the Government stuffed and padded with similar incompetent employees, who render no beneficial service, and are a hindrance rather than help.

So we must multiply $63,000 by 7, and we have nearly half a million dollars as the amount required annually to pension off and get rid of worthless and incompetent employees now in the Departments under the deceitful name of merit system.

That is not all, the gentlemen who are running the incubator that hatches such worthless ducks [laughter], known in the vernacular of squawmen as the Civil Service Commission, wants about $100,000 more to keep the machine in gear for the next year, making some $600,000 that we should appropriate for the current year, not to make more efficient the service that we are to have, but to care for the hatchery and support the worthless beats, barnacles, and fossils [laughter] who render no adequate service for the money they receive, that the so-called merit system has already burdened us with. [Laughter and applause.]

I believe it has debauched the public service; that there is not a Department of the Government in this city to-day that is as efficient, as intelligent, or has the capacity to render three-fourths as much intelligent service as was obtained under the system practiced under Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, and Grant.

I believe the Departments, some of them at least, are hives in which drones are housed and fed—large colonies of drones.

Competent, intelligent, and faithful employees during Cleveland's last Administration were singled out and discharged, or were reduced and obliged to resign, and incompetent persons, ward strikers, political tricksters, and heelers pensioned on the Government for life under the merit system.

I believe I am stating facts, and those who have had experience under both systems know my statements are true.

These are the penalties we are paying because we abandoned the wise and patriotic policy that obtained from Washington to Grant, inclusive, and followed some jack-o'-lantern statesmen, no one of whom ever yet has given a reason why this theory would work in practice half as substantial as Cotton Mather gave some years ago in Massachusetts for hanging one woman because another called her a witch. [Laughter.]

I am not certain but that the mugwump descended from Mather. I think there are a few specimens in Massachusetts now.

From $72 to $144 per year is regarded as a liberal pension by mugwump editors and statesmen to soldiers who slept on the ground in storms and mud, in snow and rain, were roasted and frozen, lived on salt hog or horse, and in prisons on dogs, cats, and rats, were shot and sabered until health and comfort in life were forever destroyed.

They received $13 per month for being shot at. But to the persons who sit in a Department of the Government never more than eight hours a day for not more than two-thirds of the days in a year and received on an average $1,500 a year—they are to be pensioned at $900. [Applause.]

You pension the old soldier at from $6 to $12 per month; the worthless mugwump at never less than $75, as now suggested.

I said that under the "merit system" during Cleveland's last Administration the worthy and best were discharged from the service, or their salaries reduced, and they obliged to resign, and their places filled with his strikers. Following is a list of removals and resignations and the number appointed during the time covered by the reports of his Secretaries:

Under Mr. GROSVENOR'S resolutions, ex-Secretary Carlisle reported to the House January 11, 1897, that from March 3, 1893, to October 31, 1896, he had removed 1,123 persons in the Treasury Department, had reduced 418, that 669 had resigned, that 1,615 had been promoted, and 1,870 appointed. Among those removed were 169 ex-Union soldiers. That is about as good a record as would have been made under the "spoils" system.

The ex-Secretary of the Interior reported to the House January 9, 1897, that between March 4, 1893, and the date of his report there had been in his Department 415 removals, 541 resignations, 668 reductions, 1,029 appointments, and 1,567 promotions. Here we have 956 resignations and removals, and there were only 325 reinstatements, leaving net 631 removed or forced to resign. Of the removals and resignations 305 were ex-Union soldiers. (See House Document 167, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session.)

Mr. Morton, ex-Secretary of Agriculture, under date of February 8, 1897, reported to the House of Representatives that during his term of office, March 5, 1893, to January 15, 1897, he removed 1,116 persons; that he reduced 189 employees and promoted 1,059; that of ex-Union soldiers he removed 117, reduced 36. (See House Document 275, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session, page 86.)

The ex-Secretary of War reported to the House January 11, 1897, that between March 4, 1893, and the date of his report he had removed 303 persons, reduced 267, appointed 187, resigned 115, reduced 270, and promoted 315; of those removed (outside of Record and Pension Office) 46 were ex-Union soldiers.

Ex-Postmaster-General Wilson reported to the House January 11, 1897, that between March 4, 1893, and June 5, 1896, he had removed 89 persons; reduced 62; that 81 had resigned, 24 of the removals having been ex-Union soldiers.

The ex-Secretary of the Navy reported January 8,1897, that between March 4, 1893, and the date of his report there were removed 4, with 20 reductions, 13 resignations, 39 appointments, and 45 promotions. Eight of the reductions and all 4 of the removals were ex-Union soldiers.

Were 4,375 people removed and forced to resign found efficient by one man and inefficient by his successor?

It that a record to go to the country on to prove the efficiency of civil-service appointees? What other inference can be drawn? Only this, that they were gotten out of the way for political reasons! If either proposition is true, it calls for the repeal of this law. It is a confessed fraud, a sham, and a delusion; to us a snare.

It will be seen that 709 of those forced out of the service were Union soldiers.

Let us turn from this state of facts, loathsome to every American who has any self-respect, in which there stand out conspicuously imbecility, hypocrisy, and successful debauchery of the civil service of the Government to an extent never before supposed to be possible, filling the offices and positions with worthless beats, unfortunate for the Government, not yet dead, facts which ought to mantle the cheeks of 70,000,000 people with the crimson tint of shame, that with Congress in session a law which tolerates such shameful abuses and taxes the people to support those who would be tramps but for the salaries they draw from the Government can remain for one hour unrepealed.

I said, "Let us turn from this condition of things which has grown up in a short time, and is the logical and inevitable result of this bastard called the merit system [laughter], to the true and only merit system—that which commended itself to the wisdom of the fathers, their patriotic sons and grandsons, from Washington to Grant.

That system required every employee in the Government service, when night came, to point to some labor performed, some service rendered which was an adequate consideration for the compensation that he or she received. He must exhibit fruits and results, or get, and give place to one ready to produce such.

He was dependent; the creature of this bastard merit system is absolutely independent.

He has won a position for life by spelling dog and cat. He has evidenced his mathematical superiority over the rest of mankind by counting the four fingers on one hand. He has satisfied the Civil Service Commission that if two were cut off he would still have two left. [Laughter.]

He has copied "with his own hand" several words. He has evidenced his familiarity with United States money by telling which was a dime and which a cart-wheel dollar in silver; and when asked to look at some Continental money and a greenback and tell which the greenback was, he pointed to the greenback and was complimented by the commissioners for his matchless sagacity. [Laughter.]

He has a certainty. Administrations may come and go, parties may rise and fall, floods, earthquakes, pestilence, and famine may scourge mankind; he is still there. [Laughter.]

He adjusts his anatomy to an easy-chair, places his feet upon the desk, takes a chew of fine-cut tobacco, and thanks God for the Civil Service Commission and that he is not like other men. To him the future is secure.

Who are they who have clamored the loudest for the application of civil-service regulations, or the merit system, as they are pleased to call it for deceitful and hypocritical purposes? Are they not the enemies of the Republican party, and, in fact, of all parties? They, prating their own virtues, denounce Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, and Grant as spoilsmen. Why? Because, when elevated to the highest position in governmental affairs by the votes of men who believed as they did, their sense of honor, of duty, and decency impelled them to act with loyalty toward those who placed them in the exalted position which they occupied, instead of excluding them from employment in the Government service and filling the positions with their political foes, thereby giving aid and comfort to their enemies.

Loyalty and fidelity, gratitude, honorable and decent conduct toward those who are true to convictions are offenses in the eye and understanding of these eunuchs and Ishmaelites in politics that should be prohibited by statute. [Laughter.]

Their patron saint is Benedict Arnold. Their code of morals must have been copied from an epilogue in Captain Kidd's log book, and the ancestors of some of them may have been captured by General Stark at Bennington. [Laughter.]

They, immediately after the inauguration of McKinley, with appalling presumption, amazing audacity, matchless impudence, and paralyzing arrogance, hovered round the heads of Departments and proposed that they be allowed to dictate to their victorious political foes how they should manage in selecting laborers, employees, and officials; who should or not be promoted or discharged, and especially that our enemies, defeated, routed, should continue to retain positions of honor and emolument and Republicans be excluded therefrom.

And this came, and continues to come, from a little band of defeated guerrillas whose only object in life and means of subsistence is political plunder.

If they had been treated as the Cuban patriots recently did one who entered their lines to induce whoever he might to betray their associates, there would have not been any great boom in the undertakers' business, but a few less Hessians.

I hope for the immediate independence of Cuba and its annexation to the United States, if for no other reason, that we may have a few men under our flag who are not afraid of that corpse known as the Spanish Government, that has existed only in imagination as one of the powers of the earth for the last half century, and will not become her ally on land or sea in perpetrating crimes against a weak but brave people whose only offense consists in defending themselves against Spanish barbarities, the blackest, most infamous and fiendish that ever disgraced man, shocked heaven, or could be conceived in hell. [Laughter.]

I have stated that I am a spoilsman, and as such have desired and still desire to obtain positions for constituents of mine who need no certificate from a mugwump commission to evidence their capacity to fill any Government position, from that of President down, with as much ability as they are ordinarily filled, and in saying this I mean no discourtesy or disparagement to any, and I in no wise exaggerate the capacity and ability of those for whom I speak. As men and women in all avocations and walks of life they have demonstrated that they are the peers of any in the Govment in peace and war. I go to a Department and ask that the widow of a Union soldier be given a clerkship; she is competent, a correct accountant and excellent penwoman. I am refused; there is no place for this lady, under civil service, in the employ of the Government. But the widow of General Pickett, who led the charge against the Union forces at Gettysburg in resisting which my constituent's husband fell mortally wounded, is an employee in that Department, blanketed in for life under civil-service rules. I go to a Department to solicit a position for the daughter of a Union soldier whose father died in his boots at Spottsylvania, shot through the body while upholding our flag. There is no place for her, but two daughters, or sisters, I am not certain which, of Jackson, who killed Colonel Ellsworth, are in that Department, on the pay roll for life.

During Cleveland's Administration one Colonel Williams, Auditor for the Interior Department, one day called up sixteen Union soldiers and asked them how they voted. They told him as they fought, for the Union, the Republican ticket. He said, "Gentlemen, you can not expect us to keep you; we must care for our own." They were discharged, and, as I am informed, Confederate soldiers took their places, or the places of most of them. They are still there, pensioners for life on the bounty of a Government they fought to destroy.

The Pension Bureau to-day is honeycombed, crowded with men, adjusting the claims of Union soldiers for pensions, who are hostile, some of whom served in the Confederate army and shot off the arms and legs of the claimants and caused the disabilities for which the Government is asked to allow them a pension.

These same Confederates and Bryanites are the judges of widows' claims whose husbands they killed, or who died of disease contracted from exposure in resisting their efforts to shoot this Government out of existence; these are blanketed in office for life under the merit system and Union soldiers walk the streets of this capital begging for employment and at times for bread.

You who will may support, sustain, and apologize for and excuse the outrages perpetrated under this system. I for one am for the immediate and unconditional repeal of the law, regardless of who favors it or the position they occupy.

We have plenty of men in this country who fought under the flag that floats over the Pension Office, competent to do all that need be done there by men, and it is both an insult and outrage to exclude them and employ those who brought all the misery, anguish, and woe upon those who have been and are suffering, and burdened the nation with a tax of $140,000,000 annually for pensions, which is not more than two-thirds of what it really ought to be and that justice demands that it should be.

There are enough widows and daughters of Union soldiers whose husbands and fathers were slain in resisting that hell-born crusade against liberty and humanity, to perform all the duties for women to do in that Bureau, without the aid of Mrs. General Pickett, Miss Jackson, and other female Confederates.

A Republican Congress that has it in its power to wipe out a statute that in effect pensions Confederate soldiers and the wives and daughters of Confederate soldiers for services in obstructing and rejecting the claims of Union soldiers, their widows and dependent, helpless orphans, for a pension, will find a long list of those lost in action when the roll is called next November, if it fails to do it.

I am for the Union soldiers, their widows and orphans, when on dress parade, but no more so than when on duty in this House. I am not a mugwump; I vote as I believe to be right and take orders from no one. [Applause.]

I may be in error, but it is my opinion that if the Pension Bureau was purged, as it should be, of good-for-nothing, worthless employees, and those who are hostile to pension claimants, who were educated under Cleveland to reject claims that could not longer be held up by reason of pressure for a decision, and who were promoted for the number they rejected rather than for an honest, just, and equitable determination under the law, at least 25 per cent of those now employed would be discharged and at least 25 per cent more accomplished than is being done to-day. It is notorious to all who have any experience in these matters in that Bureau that when a claimant, after waiting years, having furnished all the evidence required by the rules of the Bureau, asks why his or her claim is not adjudicated, he or she will receive in reply a call for evidence which is then on file and has been for years, which will be again furnished, and when in perhaps six months or a year the claimant again asks the cause of delay, the same evidence is again called for. I think I have known this call made as many as five times in a single case and the evidence furnished as many times. This held up the claim for years, deprived the needy and suffering claimant of what was his or her due under the law, and, what was of no little consequence to the clerk, did not lessen his chance to keep his job.

Often it happens that when a claim has been pending for years and evidence furnished upon which it should have been adjudicated, in response to an inquiry by the claimant for cause of delay, he will be informed that there is no such claim on file. These are the leeches who are pensioned onto the Government for life under the operation of the civil-service law, called the "merit system." There is no reason or excuse for the delay in adjudicating claims in that office, such as exist to-day, unless it be that the force is worthless. An immediate change and more rapid adjudication are demanded by a patriotic people in behalf of needy and long-suffering claimants.

I have spoken more particularly of the Pension Bureau for the reason that I believe it is an insult to every loyal man or woman in this country to place the interests of Union soldiers and their widows in the hands of their enemies for adjudication.

But every department of the Government is full of Confederates and Bryanites. In the Government Printing Office there are 2,000 enemies of the Republican party and about 500 of its friends.

As a rule, when you find a Union soldier in the service, he was reduced under Cleveland to a very low salary, and to-day he is under a Confederate who is chief of a division, auditor, or something of that kind, and the Union soldier takes orders from one whom he never took orders from on fields where blood ran, and was not then and is not now his inferior.

That condition of things exists in the Departments of the Government in this city to-day. Confederates almost invariably have the places that pay the best, and this in the teeth of the platform of every national convention of the Republican party ever since 1864, in defiance of the law which gives preference to Union soldiers. I went to a Department a few days since in behalf of an old soldier whose salary had been reduced, under Cleveland, by a Confederate.

This old hero, wounded in the service, who is by statute law entitled to a preference, had been recommended by the chief official in that office and the chief of his division for restoration to his former salary, and I was refused, with the suggestion that he would not be able to pass the civil-service examination. Think of it! A man who has been in the Department for years, an expert in his line, recommended by the chief official having charge of work in his line, also by the chief of his division; this man who from Bull Run to Appomattox had faced the enemies of his country in deadly combat, one whom the civil-service law declares shall have a preference, turned down, refused restoration to the position he formerly occupied, in the matter of salary, for the alleged reason that he would not be able to crawl through the meshes of the Civil Service Commission's examination in the precise manner those wet nurses might suggest as the test of his capacity to do the work he is now and for years has been doing to the perfect satisfaction of those having charge of that work and who are responsible for results.

By the side of this old soldier, who is an expert in his line, in the same office is a man from the South who came in as a laborer. No examination was required of him, he has been ranked up to $1,600 annually, and the old soldier, wearing the scars of saber cuts received in battle, his body disfigured with wounds made by bullets which sped from rifles held in the hands of some Confederate, it may not be the man who works beside him, has been reduced to the lowest possible figure above starvation rate and refused restoration.

These are the results that come from worshiping that queen of harlots, the boss prostitute in American politics, that has done and is doing more to-day to debauch our politics and destroy the efficiency of those in the civil service of the Government than all other influences combined since the organization of the Government—the so-called merit system.

To you gentlemen on the other side of the House I say, if in the chapter of accidents you ever again control this Government, I want you to have a clean deck and men of your own choice to manage what will then soon be a wreck, as it always has been when you were in power.

But when the Republican party is in power, none of you, who attempted to destroy the Union of States, the would-be wreckers of our financial system and the national honor, should be on duty in any Department of the Government and Union soldiers excluded.

To my friends on this side of the House I desire to suggest that in supporting this commission you are false to principles you have in every platform in our national conventions declared to be sacred, from 1864 to 1896.

You repudiate declarations, made to the people, of your purpose to give preference to soldiers of the Union Army for places in the employ of the Government.

In your haste to embrace this prostitute in politics called the merit system you strike down the Union soldiers, their widows and children; hold them out of positions they once held and were driven from to make places for Confederates; you ratify the acts of an Administration elected by Confederates that reduced the few now remaining in the service to almost starvation rates, hoping thereby to humiliate and cause them to resign, and placed over them by promotion men whose only claim to the position to which they were appointed came from the fact that during the four years that the fate of the nation hung trembling in the balance the blood of Union soldiers was dripping from every finger on their hands.

Gentlemen, the American people are intensely loyal to those who defended this Government against its enemies with arms in their hands from '61 to '65. Their gratitude to them, their widows and orphans, is deep seated, well grounded, and can not be eradicated by any men or party for the next quarter of a century. The men or party who attempt to withhold from them what a grateful and patriotic people are eager to give in pensions and position, under existing laws and others that are certain ere long to be enacted, to the honor of those who are enjoying the benefits and blessings purchased by their sacrifices and sufferings, and for the benefit of those who sacrificed, will be rebuked as was Cleveland and his officials. There was not enough left of them to be dignified to the importance of a corps.

If we walk in their footprints, follow in their wake, we shall indeed have economy in one direction: There will be no use for hacks, a hearse, or even a wheelbarrow at our funeral; the remains can be carried to the place of interment in a peck basket, and it will not be half full.

I have no sympathy with those who seem to be hostile to those who have accumulated property; I rejoice that they have it, and will go as far as anyone in supporting legislation to protect their property and them in the enjoyment of it. I believe it should be done, by men with arms in their hands if necessary. That is one of the things for which government among men was instituted. And on the other hand I will insist that they who preserved the Government when traitors with shot and shell assailed it, who gave to its bonds every penny in value they possess to-day—that the pittance they are entitled to under the law shall in no wise be withheld or their rights in that direction be abridged one iota.

We are not poor, but the wealthiest nation of earth. To listen to some speeches made on this floor one from a far-off country would think he had found a convention of tramps, assembled as a committee of ways and means to fix on a location where they could camp out for the night. [Laughter.]

Outside of the beneficiaries who are holding office under this nuisance act, the odds and ends, flood-wood and Hessians, who occasionally vote our ticket that thrift may follow fawning [laughter], I do not believe there can be found 1,000 Republicans who understand the workings and operations of this demoralizing and expensive method of doing Government business who favor it. There are innocent theorists who have no knowledge of the practical workings and increased expense to the Government that may incline toward its support. I have never yet looked one in the eye on the floor of this House who practiced it.

No matter how emphatically or often in public places, like the ancient Pharisee, he thanks God he is not like other men, and mankind almost universally thank God they are not what he is, yet when he selects his private secretary he does not consult the Civil Service Commission. He does not appoint a Democrat; he does not select a man who is opposed to his renomination and who will vote against him and for a Democrat or Populist, if he is nominated, and against the party to which he belongs.

Show me one of these new-born eunuchs in the political arena, no matter whether it be in this House or the Senate end of the Capitol, and I will show you invariably a man who has pursued the President and the heads of Departments crying "give me patronage for my friends," with all the energy and persistency that a sleuthhound follows his game. [Laughter.]

I am a spoilsman. I have been there and tried to get something for my constituents who are qualified, merit, and deserve recognition at the hands of a Republican Administration which they contributed their full share to create. I never got there so early or stayed so late that I could not see around me these great reformers, with a merry twinkle in their eyes and a hungry look upon their faces as they approached the President and heads of Departments and eloquently, and sometimes as piteously as a tramp asks for bread, explain how necessary and important it was that their strikers be appointed to almost every position from minister plenipotentiary to Great Britain down through the whole list to charwoman in every Department of the Government. [Laughter.]

If we could have printed the recommendations of those who declaim the most vociferously for civil service in the Senate and in the House, it would be found that the paper on which their solicitations were made would paper the walls of each Chamber, and if they could be read as clearly as Belshazzar read the writing on the wall, their knees might not tremble as he did, but their voices would be as silent as the tomb, and I have no doubt that some of them have traveled a distance greater than that across the continent from Maine to California searching, begging, and beseeching the President and heads of Departments to appoint their friends to office.

Gentlemen, you must have observed that most of them look tired, and especially so since the discussion of this subject commenced. [Laughter.]

A photograph of the President, taken almost any day since he entered the White House from 10 a. m. to 12 m., surrounded by applicants for the appointment of their friends to positions would exhibit the faces of more hypocrites than Christ had about him when he felt constrained to expose them in the following unambiguous language:

> Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayer: therefore ye shall receive the greater damnation.
> Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is made, ye make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselves.
> Ye blind guides, which strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel.
> Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye make clean the outside of the cup and of the platter, but within they are full of extortion and excess.
> Even so ye also outwardly appear righteous unto men, but within ye are full of hypocrisy and iniquity.
> Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?

Gratitude, fidelity, and loyalty to those who are true to you are as old and just as God. He rewards His friends and excludes His enemies from all positions in His government.

David, with an inspired hand, wrote: "Thou shalt not plow with the ox and ass yoked together." No mugwumpism in that, but an absolute prohibition of their pet method of doing business. David, looking down through the ages to come, beheld the mugwump, as God beholds the proud afar off, and warned mankind against his teaching and practices.

Paul, the grandest old Roman of the New Dispensation, wrote to Timothy, who was afflicted in his surroundings with Pharisees and hypocrites: "But if any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel."

I say to the gentleman from Indiana who talks about platforms: That is our platform. We ask no more; God willing, we will take no less. [Laughter and applause.] If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] had been present when Timothy read that letter, they would have repaired to some public place and denounced Paul as a "spoilsman." [Great laughter.] The truth is that these men, while clamoring and asking why the Government should not do its business as business men do theirs, are attempting to inaugurate a method that no individual, partnership, or corporation ever attempted, ever can or will attempt so long as reason guides them.

How long would a merchant do business with his clerks advising his customers to go elsewhere to make their purchases?

How long would an insurance company employ men for soliciting agents who at all times and to everybody were recommending some other company as more beneficial to the insured than the one they represented?

How long would the directors and managing men in a railroad corporation continue to hold their positions if they were continually seeking to influence the patrons of their road to do their business over some other line?

No party can live in this country that turns its back on its friends and gives the patronage at its disposal to its political foes. It ought not to, and the good sense of the American people will see to it that any party which attempts it dies young in the practice, and, like the young widow, with her brow craped in mourning, as she looked down upon the remains of her husband in the casket, will exclaim, "How beautiful in death!" [Laughter.]

I am a party man, a partisan. I was elected as such. I stand here to-day to represent and not to betray or turn my back on the men who elected me. My convictions are the same here as when on dress parade soliciting votes for the candidates of the Republican party from President to overseer of the poor. I am for Republicans for each and every position and for the exclusion of Bryanites.

My constituents need no certificate that they are qualified for any position signed by a commission of mugwumps. They object to being taxed to pay the expense of such a commission—$200,000 annually to keep their enemies in office and fence them out.

"The voluntary tribute of a persistent fool is the legitimate harvest of a wise man." I do not want my party to be that fool or its opponents to reap the harvest.

I have not forgotten October, 1896, when I canvassed my district for the Republican ticket. Our meetings in that latitude at that season of the year are usually held in the evening—that means in the night. I remember well the efforts of the young men at those meetings, marching with kerosene torches above their heads, mud sometimes ankle deep, in the procession, sometimes only a few companies, at others miles of them. They made the welkin ring with cheers for McKinley, protection, and sound money. They quickened with gladness the pulsations of my heart, and sent the blood to the extremities of my slight frame with increased velocity. [Applause.]

There was not a mugwump in the ranks. They were partisans, politicians, patriots. These men saved this nation from everlasting disgrace. I say to you here to-day that had I the power, and one of those boys applied to me for a place that he was competent to fill—and he would not ask for one that he could not fill—I would kick out of office the best-looking mugwump God ever made, and give him the place. [Laughter and applause.]

My position is that he who will turn his back on those who by their votes elected him to an office to represent them evidences to my mind the total depravity of man, and would lead me to hope for what I never yet believed, that there ought to be a hell. [Laughter.]

I have intimated, rather delicately perhaps, that the fruit this civil service bears is a worthless, good-for-nothing article; that the commission is an unnecessary luxury not desired by our people, and if we have got them on hand to support, I will suggest that we had better ship them to Cuba, tender them to Blanco with the suggestion that he send them to Gomez to solicit submission on the plan of autonomy proposed by Spain, and the further suggestion that if autonomy fails and they do not return, we will not seek to know what became of their anatomies.

Ambition, desire to excel, to earn more, stimulates mankind to press on to the front rank in every calling or avocation in life.

The moment you take away the opportunity to get there, hope no longer stimulates.

That is exactly what civil service, as practiced, does to the employee in the Government service.

The life tenure makes each individual a stationary machine, fixed like a knot hole in a board, and nearly as useful, with no fear of falling out, dropping behind, or hope of getting ahead.

This system not only destroys hope and ambition, but it is very injurious to the health of those who endure the mental anguish incident to such an examination by the commissioners as I have described.

I wish to incorporate here a statement which I believe to be correct, which proves this system to be more injurious to health than any parasite ever heretofore discovered. Of the 15,000 subordinate places in the Departments in Washington 13,734 are under civil service. Of that number 5,276 had sick leave with pay last year.

There was lost to the Government 79,140 days' work from sickness; 275 days constitute an average year's work in the Departments; the total loss was 287 years' work, and as an average year's work costs about $1,500, the total loss to Uncle Sam was nearly $430,500 during the last year.

My God! what sacrifices are being made on the altar of the merit system! Who can think of the mountains of physical and mental anguish and woe that this abomination has already inflicted upon some 13,000 employees in the Departments in this city and doubt that martyrs are among us.

The history of the wars of earth will fail to describe a conflict so destructive to health where so few were employed for so short a time.

Humanity, with her eyes bedewed with tears, holds out her hands beseeching us to come to their rescue.

Let the noble souls who are filled with righteous indignation at the barbarities of the Turks and brutalities of the Spaniards turn their eyes upon these hospitals and behold what misery the merit system has already wrought. These skeletons, ghosts, and horrid relics are all that is left of what were perfect anatomies when a few months ago they entered these jaws of death through the excruciating test of the merit system.

Gentlemen, we must call a halt; this nation can not afford to sacrifice so many great intellects and perfect anatomies. Let us go back to the system of the fathers, the method in practice under Washington and Lincoln. We shall then have good health and a good day's work for fair pay. If we fail to do this, I fear we shall not, in the future, constitute that great host which John saw, that no man could number, which I always supposed was the Republican party. We have certainly come up through tribulation. [Laughter.]

Now, gentlemen, I am for that kind of civil service that the Republican party declared for when it went into its first national campaign with that morning-glory of the Republican party, John C. Frémont, for its standard bearer. I am for that kind of civil service we find described in the platform upon which Lincoln was nominated. My civil-service friends have forgotten one of the particular schools that ought to be held. Lincoln was a rail splitter. Have you made any provision for the examination of a rail splitter in these rules? Lincoln! the grandest and noblest man who ever sat in that Presidential chair or ever will, the preservation and perpetuation of whose memory will be ever dear to the American people; to whose grave pilgrims will come from every land and clime and plant flowers around the spot where his ashes rest, and will moisten them with tears of gratitude long years after mankind shall have forgotten where the last mugwump was buried! [Laughter and loud applause on the Republican side.]

During the delivery of the above remarks the time of Mr. SULLOWAY twice expired, and at the request of Mr. BROWN and Mr. BARNEY was extended.

Mr. LOW. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the fact that the hour is late. I am tired, and I know that the members are tired also. In addressing the House at this time I certainly labor under the disadvantages referred to.

Before discussing the question of civil-service reform, I desire to state that I believe the original advocates of civil-service reform, likewise all converts to the system, have been and are absolutely honest in their convictions. I will also state at this time that I do not advocate the repeal of the civil-service law in its entirety; but when a person criticises civil-service reform or any part thereof, the civil-service reformers jump to their feet and vehemently cry "Spoils system!" "Corrupt patronage!" etc.

Now, Mr. Chairman, such implications have never sent me into spasms. I stand on a higher plane than patronage while advocating some check upon the present civil-service system, particularly the method which has been adopted by the civil-service board in determining an applicant's ability to serve the Government in one of its offices.

In supporting a measure to amend, to correct, or to modify the present civil-service law I have one specific object in view, and that is the rights and privileges of American citizens, be they university graduates or whether they are making the battle of life with a limited instruction received by the fireside of some humble home, as against any law which makes it possible to create a preferred class of citizens in this land of ours.

The civil-service laws have been on the statute books since January, 1883; hence the system has been on trial during a period of fifteen years, and it seems to me that it would be an exhibition of wisdom on the part of Congress to call a halt and note the effect of this system, and also consider what the probability of its future action would be upon the institutions of our country if continued in force on its present lines.

The people have been studying this problem and are ready to challenge the question whether or not it is wise to keep on the statute books the present laws governing the civil service of our Government. Since the adoption of the present civil-service system, its arbitrary bands, boa constrictor-like, have been coiling, coiling, coiling around all Federal Departments until it is impossible for the Assistant Secretaries of the different Departments to appoint their own private secretaries, or for any of the officials, from a Cabinet officer down, to order an office wastebasket to be emptied, unless the employee has a passport countersigned by the Civil Service Commission.

It has been a question in my mind whether or not the civil-service law has ever been an absolute benefit to the country, and grave doubts exist in the minds of many of our most intelligent people whether the Government is getting any better service than it did before the present system was adopted, which has many objectionable features. In the first place, it creates a life tenure in office, which means establishing a preferred class of citizens. Excepting judgeships, this is contrary to the laws of a republican form of government like ours and should not have been transplanted from monarchical soil. Remember under our republican form of government all citizens are eligible to enter Government employ in some capacity.

A man with a limited education, who never went beyond the multiplication table in mathematics, would make just as good a messenger or a watchman for Uncle Sam as the most competent citizen could discharge the duties of a Cabinet officer. Both are American citizens and both would measure up to the requirements of their respective offices. But civil-service reform makes invidious distinctions between citizens, particularly against the man with a mediocre education, to which I shall refer later.

How does the present law affect the Government Departments? Every civil employee of the Government, excepting mechanics and laborers, are under the classified service, with a life tenure of office. What is the result? While Republicans are in power the Democratic employees leave their politics behind and go over to camp on Republican soil and discuss employees' joint interests in the service of the Government.

Under a Democratic Administration the Republicans in the Departments will leave their politics behind, enter the Democratic camp, and harmonize all their differences, and there will be a unification in the efforts of all employees for the purpose of making their positions under the Government more secure, if possible. This keeps up until the employees become a set of political nondescripts, caring nothing for party or Administration. They combine together for self-protection, and in some districts they have been known to dictate nominations. Now, these employees can not be disciplined, for they belong to no party; besides, their stations are protected by the armor plate of life tenure; the nation's preferred class of citizens, made so by civil-service reform. Do you wonder that the people criticise and object to the present administration of the civil-service laws?

I said a few moments ago that civil service made invidious distinctions between citizens. I will illustrate: Take the method of qualifying an applicant for the eligible list. We will say that a $1,200 clerkship in the Government service is to be filled. The Civil Service Board holds an examination, and we will say that 100 young men present themselves for examination. The majority of them will be men who have had experience in that line of employment, some of whom are very competent, have families, and are seeking employment on account of honorable reasons for their enforced idleness. There will also be quite a number of academic students, and in the contingent there will be many university graduates. Who receives the highest percentage nine times out of ten at such an examination? The university graduate or the academic scholar. They number among the first to be appointed, while the very ones who are the best equipped by experience and most efficient for clerical duties are rejected. Why? Because the major part of the scholastic test was absolutely irrelevant and transcending the scope of a clerk's duty. Is such a system fair? Is it just? Have people with limited educations in classics and sciences no rights? None according to civil-service-reform ethics.

Right here let me relate an incident which came under my observation, which will clearly measure the value between theoretical knowledge and practical experience. A few years ago the proprietor of a large shipbuilding plant invited a half dozen gentlemen, including myself, to witness the trial of a new engine and boiler designed and built for the special work of hoisting heavy timber and weighty objects common in a large shipbuilding yard.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the time of the gentleman be extended ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended ten minutes. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LOW. It was an upright boiler with an engine attached. The gentleman who designed and built it was a graduate of one of the best scientific schools in the country. He was the superintendent of a large boiler and engine works. At the time appointed the guests were present, the engineer of the yard, who had run the old engine, was there and had fired up the new boiler. The designer was there also and took the engineer's place, the better to prove, as he thought, the theory of the new improvements. He turned on the steam and the engine started, but its motion was jerky and unsatisfactory. The designer made several efforts to correct the running of the engine, but failed. The old engineer, who had been watching him, stepped up and whispered something.

The designer said "Yes, yes," and he made some changes in the delicate part of the machinery, and then the engine ran smoothly for the first time. Then the designer looked at the steam gauge and found the pressure was increasing rapidly. He immediately tried the water cocks of the boiler and found the water was getting low. He examined the feed pump, found it was working, but it was not feeding the boiler. The situation was a serious one. Something had to be done immediately, but with all his theories he failed to make the feed pump force the water in the boiler. The old engineer said, "I will fix that," and he took a tin cup, dipped it into a bucket of water which stood by, and dashed the contents on the valve bulb, or joint of the feed pump. Instantly the water began to run into the boiler. Now the hoisting test of the engine came. The end of the derrick hoisting rope was attached to the drum of the engine. The other end, which led from the derrick head to the ground, was attached to a heavy piece of timber, and the engine commenced to hoist. It worked beautifully. After it had been hoisted high enough to demonstrate the power of the engine, the designer wanted to stop the engine, but found he could not without the timber falling.

An accident was imminent, and the people commenced to run. The old engineer took in the situation at once. He did not stop to apologize, but shoved the designer to one side and took charge of the engine. He immediately stopped it and lowered the timber to the ground, and hoisted and lowered it several times to show the perfect working of the engine. It was like a toy in his hands. I will ask any civil-service reformer present which of the two men was the better engineer? Were two such men to compete for an engineer's position to-day before a civil-service board, the designer would get 100 per cent plus, while the old engineer, who never met with an accident and who had a thorough knowledge of running an engine, would not get over 65 per cent. This illustrates the manner in which our civil-service examinations are held and their methods of measuring up an applicant's fitness. [Applause.]

Do you wonder that the people of this country are finding fault with the civil-service laws? By such methods the present system makes invidious distinctions, and the mediocre man in a scholastic point of view is absolutely proscribed.

Now, there is objection to another feature that has become part and parcel of civil-service reform, and in debating the system it is one of the heaviest pieces of artillery used by civil-service reformers, and that is the merit system. It is a beautiful word, catching, and attractive to the ear. It sounds so fair and just; but when we come to examine it from an impartial standpoint it becomes a misnomer.

Civil-service reformers will unblushingly tell you that politics do not affect an employee's rank, station, or pay in the Government service; that the merit system will protect him at all times. I shall controvert that statement and prove conclusively that the merit system does not give an employee immunity from persecution. If the merit system was introduced for the purpose of multiplying fraud, deceit, and legalizing favoritism on the one side, and punishing enemies on the other, it has certainly proved to be a marvelous success. It is a chariot carrying favored ones to success on the one hand, and the guillotine on the other for those who may have political views at variance with the powers that be. Is this right? Is this fair? Is it just? Do you wonder that the people find fault with this modern boasted structure over which flies some Republican and some Democratic bunting of approval?

I will cite a case that came under my own observation about a year ago. An old soldier, who had been employed in the Treasury Department, came to me and said that he had been discharged. I asked him what for. He said, "They have been after my place for some time and have finally put me out." I took quite an interest in him. He was a veteran, a man about 55 years old, uncommonly intelligent—in fact, a bright man in every way. I saw the chief of his bureau and asked him why this man had been discharged, and if he had any fault to find with his ability as a clerk. He said, "Far from it; he is one of the ablest clerks in my bureau; runs his desk all right; but the man keeps a gambling place and he does not pay his debts. You can look at the book where we keep the record for efficiency." I asked him if he meant the merit system, and he said "Yes." I volunteered the remark at the time that it would make a very great difference who kept that record. Hence I could not place much value upon the record as shown in their book.

I saw this clerk and told him what the charges were, and he replied, in a very straightforward manner, that he was totally deaf and could not take any pleasures in social life, and, outside of reading, the only thing that he could enjoy was a game of cards, and that it had been his custom, once a week, to have three or four up in his room to play a game of poker. He said, "One night I had a party there and there was some cheating going on and I lost a sum of money, not very large, but still I refused to settle on the ground that I had been cheated." Now, one of the party who was there that night did not like the decision of this deaf clerk and went to the Treasury Department the next day, where the deaf clerk was employed, and informed the chief that this man was running a gambling place; furthermore, he did not pay his debts.

That information was just what they wanted. Down it went on this record book, which is a part of the merit system, "Keeps a gambling place; does not pay his debts." That was enough. The next day he was dismissed, and the Government lost one of its most efficient clerks. I would like to know if at that time every officer, from the highest to the lowest, in that Department had been discharged because he played a little game of draw poker, how many would there have been left to run that great Department of the nation? This is part of the merit system. [Applause.]

Now, let me give you another side of this merit system. I will show you the chariot side now. During the last year of the Cleveland Administration (the latter part of February) Logan Carlisle, at the urgent request of politicians, transferred a young man, who was at that time a private secretary to one of the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, to an $1,800 vacancy in his office, because this man would have lost his place as private secretary had he remained in that position until the present Administration assumed the reins of Government. Now, this was a nice young man, no doubt; but his position was an exception to the rule, and he had nothing to do as private secretary—it was an absolute sinecure. He was transferred to the chief clerk's office over the heads of other clerks in the office who had rendered faithful and efficient service in the office for years. He was not willing to be transferred to a low-grade clerkship and work his way up like the rest, but wanted $1,800 or nothing, and he got it through political influence.

I will give Mr. Logan Carlisle credit here. He said it was unfair to the other clerks and he regretted the action, but the pressure was so great that it could not be resisted. Now, this was done contrary to all the rules and regulations of civil-service reform, and I desire to ask any civil-service reformer to tell me why, right under the noses of the Civil Service Commissioners, such a violation of the merit system was permitted? I will not answer that question, but will say that the three Civil Service Commissioners were then and are to-day divided in politics as follows: Two and one-half were Democrats and the other half was Republican—that is, two Democrats to one mugwump, a condition which should set the people thinking.

Now, then, I will cite another case coming under this merit system: A custom-house officer, who had served as such for sixteen years in the city of New York, was discharged. Not a scintilla of evidence could be found against him affecting his ability in the discharge of his duties, but they wanted his place and the spy system was resorted to. A letter was sent to this custom-house officer requesting him to meet a party in a café on Wall street on the following day at such an hour. This officer went down there, saw the man, and shook hands with him. They drank together. Other custom-house officials were there and were drinking. In a few minutes they all left; but the next day this custom-house officer whom I referred to was called before the collector of the port charged with being in a saloon and drinking while there. He said, "Yes, I was there and took a drink." He was then told by the collector that no officer in his department was permitted to go into a saloon, that it was a violation of orders, and this man was dismissed.

From a strictly temperate point of view, no doubt many would say that was just, but there is another side of this story, while discussing the merit system. Now, this custom-house officer had a certain district in New York to cover, and, like all districts, it had two custom-house officers, who are called partners. Now, this man's partner was a man who had only been on the force about a year, and he knew nothing about the duties. In fact, when he came into the district and talked with his old custom-house officer, he said, "I know nothing about this business, and don't care to know, as I have other business to attend to. You run it yourself." And the officer did run it. He kept all the work up unaided and alone.

Now, while this veteran custom-house officer attended strictly to his business, bearing the burden of his partner's work also, and was discharged because he visited a saloon, his partner—who never visited the district, but drew his money regularly every month—was attending to the duties as collector for four or five breweries and visited during the day probably twenty-five or thirty saloons. He was retained for merit. Where does the merit system come in in this case? This is another reason why the people are fighting civil-service reform. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. McCLEARY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed two minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. LOW. In closing, I desire to say a few words in behalf of a Cabinet official who has been criticised for the action taken by him in regard to old employees. I refer to the Secretary of the Treasury. After hearing the criticisms on this floor, I made some personal inquiries about this whole matter. I did not go to a Republican clerk, nor a Northern one, but found a man from the South who is a clerk in the Department. I asked him about the transfer of old and feeble clerks to the lowest grades in the Department. He informed me that it was one of the most just and honorable actions that had ever been done in the Department toward its employees.

I then went to the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Vanderlip, about it. He told me that this was done because the men had been there so long and were not able to keep up with the work required of a clerk in the high grades, and rather than discharge them it was concluded to put them in the lowest grade and promote younger men up to the high grades. I asked him further if this would cause an additional expense to the Government. He said, "Most assuredly not." The work will be performed just as well as ever, and I think that the Secretary of the Treasury's action in this case should be commended. It proves that the Secretary is a business man, and has a kindness of heart that does not cost the Government one penny. His action in this instance is truly commendable, and should merit the unqualified approval of the severest critic. [Applause.]

On motion of Mr. MOODY, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House bill No. 4751, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. STEWART of Wisconsin, for one week, on account of important business.

PROPOSED LIMITATION OF CIVIL-SERVICE DEBATE.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice to the House that after the reading of the Journal to-morrow, pending the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, I shall submit a motion to the House for the closing of general debate upon that paragraph of the appropriation bill which has been debated during the past week.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to ask the gentleman if he means that he will propose to close debate immediately upon the House resolving itself into Committee of the Whole?

Mr. MOODY. Oh, no, not until the end of the day, but I shall make the motion immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he does not know——

Mr. BAILEY. Then it is the purpose of the gentleman from Massachusetts to endeavor to take a vote on the bill before the House adjourns to-morrow?

Mr. MOODY. To endeavor to obtain a vote upon the bill before the House adjourns to-morrow.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, I think there are a great many others on the list who desire to speak. Of course the gentleman simply gives notice that he is going to move something, and that is all there is of it.

Mr. MOODY. Of course it will be for the House to take such action as it desires when the motion is made.

Mr. QUIGG. I hope the gentleman has looked at the list.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. I hope the gentleman will not press the matter. There are a great many who want to speak. Time has been extended to members by unanimous consent, and that has naturally shut off those who were a little modest about coming forward at an early date and putting their names on the list.

Mr. MOODY. I trust the gentleman from Kansas has not been shut off on that account.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. The vote will not be taken in Ohio anyhow until Wednesday.

Mr. FLEMING. I should like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that very few arguments in favor of sustaining the civil-service law, if any at all, have been presented on this side of the Chamber. I know there are some members of the Democratic party who are in favor of sustaining the civil-service law in its integrity. I am one of them, and I should be very glad to have an opportunity to present my argument to the House and to my fellow-Democrats on that line.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] will allow me, the committee over which I have the honor to preside will on to-morrow report an immediate deficiency bill. It is my purpose to call that bill up for consideration on Wednesday. It carries many items that are necessary for the public service. There has been almost a week's discussion upon this bill, and every member of this House upon both sides of it understands that under the rules of this House there can be no possible legislation upon the bill. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will adhere to the notice that he has given, that after the reading of the Journal to-morrow he will move to limit debate, because this bill should be passed or laid upon the table before the House adjourns to-morrow, in my judgment.

Mr. McRAE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I will say that I have given this notice after a great deal of deliberation and discussion, after a failure to obtain a cessation of debate in any other way. I propose to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal, if I am recognized by the Chair for that purpose, to test the sense of the House upon the closing of debate at 5 o'clock to-morrow. I trust there will be a full attendance here.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. EVANS. I desire to ask unanimous consent for a reprint of a bill—H. R. 5854. There has been a great demand for it, and the supply is exhausted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the reprint of the bill H. R. 5854. Is there objection?

Mr. McRAE. What is the title of the bill?

Mr. EVANS. It is the civil-service bill that has been introduced, a bill for the modification of the civil-service law. There has been great demand for it. Many members have desired copies, and the supply is exhausted. That is the only reason why I make the motion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

And then, on motion of Mr. MOODY (at 5 o'clock p. m.), the House adjourned.

He also, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2768) to grant lands to the State of Alabama for the use of the Industrial School for Girls of Alabama and of the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

MARGARET BUTLER MEADE AND HENRIETTA MEADE.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1746) granting a pension to Margaret Butler Meade and Henrietta Meade, daughters of the late Maj. Gen. George Gordon Meade, United States Army, to submit an adverse report thereon, and to recommend its indefinite postponement.

Mr. ALLEN. I can not be accused very often of insisting that the daughters of distinguished officers shall be pensioned, but it strikes me that a bill of this importance ought to have some explanation before it is indefinitely postponed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will state to the Senator from Nebraska that it is an adverse report, with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. ALLEN. So I understand.

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill proposes to pension two daughters of Major-General Meade at the rate of $100 per month each. The Committee on Pensions are not in favor of pensioning under any circumstances daughters of soldiers. Congress has pensioned a very few daughters of soldiers of the Revolutionary war, and I think one or two of the war of 1812; and the Committee on Pensions are about ready to conclude that they will go no further in that direction. Congress has pensioned only children of soldiers of the late war who from birth have been physically or mentally incapacited. A few such pensions have been granted. The committee in considering this bill felt that they could not enter upon the experiment of pensioning the daughters of General Meade, because if they did, of course the daughters of every other soldier would have a right to ask for a pension by special act. So the bill has been adversely reported.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the bill will not be indefinitely postponed, but that it will go to the Calendar, so that we can have an opportunity to investigate it and possibly debate it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course it can go to the Calendar, Mr. President.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to say in reply to the Senator from New Hampshire that——

Mr. HAWLEY. It is utterly impossible to hear the Senator. We should like to hear him.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. ALLEN. I have a very distinct recollection that bills granting pensions to the daughters of many soldiers have been passed by the Senate since I have been a member of this body. I call the Senator's attention to one that comes to my mind at this moment, the daughter of the late General Kearny. A bill passed here granting her a pension.

I can not be accused of being in favor of high pensions for the daughters or sons or widows of distinguished officers. I reiterate my adherence to the doctrine of absolute equality among soldiers, regardless of their rank, who performed their duty to the Government at the proper time, and their widows and their orphans, and I want the American people, so far as they may be concerned, to understand my position in that respect. But here is a soldier who performed remarkable services. It is very questionable whether, if General Meade had not been at Gettysburg at the time of that great battle, we would have had a united Government to-day. I do not believe it is good policy, and I do not believe it is sound wisdom, when applicants like these come to Congress for recognition in consequence of the services of their father, that their claim should be investigated by a committee, which is a star-chamber affair at the best, and reported adversely and whistled down the wind without the Senate having an opportunity to investigate the evidence and pass upon the merits of their claim.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly I have no objection to the bill going to the Calendar, and of course I have not the least objection to the Senator from Nebraska making a speech on the subject at any time. But I wish to say to the Senate and to the country that if Congress enters upon the matter of pensioning the daughters of the soldiers of the late war, billions and not millions will be required to meet the obligations of the Government, so far as pensions are concerned.

Mr. ALLEN. We had better do that than throw away millions of dollars a year in creeks and mill ponds under river and harbor appropriations, for which the people never receive any benefit in return.

Mr. GALLINGER. That matter does not come before the Committee on Pensions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

TICKET BROKERAGE.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. CULLOM on the 7th instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That in considering Senate bill No. 1575, entitled "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,'" the Committee on Interstate Commerce shall have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to examine witnesses, under oath, touching the matters which they are hereby empowered to investigate, and may employ a stenographer; and the necessary and proper expenses incurred in the execution of this order shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee.

ISSUE OF DUPLICATE CHECK.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (S. 2739) directing the issue of a check in lieu of a lost check drawn by Bernard R. Green in favor of Frederick MacMonnies, to report it favorably without amendment.

I will simply state, in asking for present consideration, that a check was drawn by Bernard R. Green, the superintendent of the Library building, in payment for the brass doors, and it has been lost. We have a statute which authorizes the issue of duplicate checks when the originals are lost, but limits the amount to $2,500. The object of the bill is simply to allow a duplicate check to be issued as duplicate checks are issued when the amount is under $2,500. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

CASH ENTRIES OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. BERRY. I sought yesterday morning to have a bill passed, to which the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] objected. I am very anxious to have it pass the Senate, and I ask unanimous consent now to call up the bill (H. R. 4221) to confirm certain cash entries of public lands.

Mr. HALE. After this bill has been disposed of, as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] is not here to move to go into executive session, I will ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the Calendar for unobjected cases for one hour. If we can do that each morning, we shall very soon go through with it, as it is

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4221) to confirm certain cash entries of public lands. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all entries of the public lands made under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands to actual settlers and cultivators," approved August 4, 1854, which are illegal and invalid because of the failure of the registers and receivers to previously collect from the settler the full price of the lands covered thereby, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed, if, upon examination by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the same are found to be otherwise regular and in compliance with said act and the acts supplemental thereto.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator who reported the bill. It confirms patents which have been issued where it is supposed there is some defect. The object of it, I imagine, is very proper. But I notice the bill provides that they shall be confirmed if the Commissioner of the General Land Office finds that they are in all respects, except the informalities spoken of, correct. Now, how is that fact to be ascertained? To make the confirmation valid and effectual the fact that the Commissioner of the General Land Office finds that in other respects the patents were all right must be in some way ascertained. There is no provision for its ascertainment in the bill. I call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to it. I do not myself know much about such things.

Mr. BERRY. I will state to the Senator from Connecticut that prior to the war, under the graduation act, it was provided that all lands that had been on the market for a certain number of years should be sold at a dollar an acre; that those which had been on the market for a longer period of years should be sold at 75 cents an acre, and down to 50 cents an acre. Under that act the registers and receivers made some mistakes in the classification of the lands, placing some lands at 50 cents an acre when probably they should have been placed at 75 cents an acre. The final receipt was issued, but when the cases came to the Land Office the patent was never issued by the Government.

The Senator from Connecticut is mistaken about the bill confirming patents. The intention is that it shall authorize the issuance of patents which have not been issued. The Secretary of the Interior, in writing about it and approving the bill, states that there were about 6,000 of these entries at the close of the war, and they have since adjusted in the office about 4,000, leaving only about 2,000 of them. Those lands have changed hands in the last twenty-five or thirty years. Probably few who were the original purchasers own them to-day. But they were paid for in good faith at the price fixed by the Land Office, and the parties have since transferred them in most cases; and the Secretary of the Interior and the House committee and the House of Representatives held that it was better to adjust the matter and have it finally settled.

In regard to the provision spoken of by the Senator from Connecticut, it simply means to apply where there are no conflicting titles; that is to say, that in this respect the entries shall be confirmed provided there were not outstanding equities or other reasons to prevent him from doing it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I understand that the patents have not been issued.

Mr. BERRY. They have not been issued.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. And if this bill passes and the Commissioner finds that the entries were regular in other respects except those mentioned, he will then issue the patents?

Mr. BERRY. That is the proposed law.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That answers the question I asked.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE. I learn that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS] is desirous to address the Senate this morning upon the immigration bill, and has given notice to that effect. Therefore I withdraw my request that we shall go to the Calendar.

DAVID O. BURLEIGH.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill (S. 473) for the relief of David O. Burleigh. It will take but a moment.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that David O. Burleigh shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a captain of Company I, Fourth New Hampshire Infantry Volunteers, on the 4th day of June, 1864, and directs the Secretary of War to revoke the order cashiering Burleigh and to issue to him a certificate of honorable discharge as of that date.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BIMETALLIC NEGOTIATIONS.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I desire to give notice that, on Monday next, at the close of the morning business of the Senate, I shall ask permission to address the Senate on some matters connected with the recent bimetallic negotiations.

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. CAFFERY. I desire to announce that on Thursday next, after the morning hour, I will address the Senate on the immigration bill.

UINTAH INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. RAWLINS. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 1883) for the appointment of a commission to make allotments of lands in severalty to Indians upon the Uintah Reservation in Utah, and to obtain the cession to the United States of all lands within said reservation not so allotted.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I ought to know about the bill, as it was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, of which I am a member, but it was considered and reported at some time when I was not present. I therefore wish to inquire whether it has been usual to appoint a commission by Congress to make allotments of land? I have the impression that it has been the custom heretofore to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make such allotments. This seems to be rather an unusual provision. I am not sure about it, and I should like to hear from the Senator from Utah on the point I suggest.

Mr. RAWLINS. The object of the bill is to enable the proper officers to carry into effect existing legislation. The act of 1894 authorized the appointment of a commission with similar duties imposed upon them. The appropriation provided in that act has been exhausted, and at the last session Congress passed a law providing for the opening of the Uncompahgre Reservation, to take effect the 1st of April next. The object of the bill is to enable the Secretary of the Interior to provide for the Uncompahgre Indians who may not be able to obtain allotments upon their reservation allotments on the Uintah Reservation, with the consent of the Indians on that reservation. The bill is in line with the recommendations of the Secretary of the Interior, and I do not think there can be any ground of objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask that the regular order may be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 112) to amend the immigration laws of the United States.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask that the bill may be read in full.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read at length.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act of March 3, 1891, in amendment of the immigration and contract-labor acts, be, and hereby is, amended by adding to the classes of aliens thereby excluded from admission to the United States the following:

"All persons physically capable and over 16 years of age who can not read and write the English language or some other language; but a person not so able to read and write who is over 50 years of age and is the parent or grandparent of a qualified immigrant over 21 years of age and capable of supporting such parent or grandparent may accompany such immigrant, or such a parent or grandparent may be sent for and come to join the family of a child or grandchild over 21 years of age similarly qualified and capable, and a wife or minor child not so able to read and write may accompany or be sent for and come to join the husband or parent similarly qualified and capable."

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of testing the ability of the immigrant to read and write, as required by the foregoing section, the inspection officers shall be furnished with copies of the Constitution of the United States, printed on numbered uniform pasteboard slips, each containing not less than 20 nor more than 25 words of said Constitution printed in the various languages of the immigrants in double small pica type. These slips shall be kept in boxes made for that purpose, and so constructed as to conceal the slip from view, each box to contain slips of but one language, and the immigrant may designate the language in which he prefers the test shall be made. Each immigrant shall be required to draw one of said slips from the box and read, and afterwards write out, in full view of the immigration officers, the words printed thereon. Each slip shall be returned to the box immediately after the test is finished, and the contents of the box shall be shaken up by an inspection officer before another drawing is made. No immigrant failing to read and write out the slip thus drawn by him shall be admitted, but he shall be returned to the country from which he came at the expense of the steamship or railroad company which brought him, as now provided by law. The inspection officers shall keep in each box at all times a full number of said printed pasteboard slips, and in the case of each excluded immigrant shall keep a certified memorandum of the number of the slip which the said immigrant failed to read or copy out in writing. If in any case, from any unavoidable cause, the foregoing slips are not at hand for use, the inspection officers shall carefully and thoroughly test the ability of the immigrant to read and write, using the most appropriate and available means at their command, and shall state fully in writing the reasons why the slips are lacking, and describe the substitute method adopted for testing the ability of the immigrant.

SEC. 3. That this act shall not apply to persons arriving in the United States from any port or place in the Island of Cuba during the continuance of the present disorders there who have heretofore been inhabitants of that island.

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect three months after its passage.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, no more important question can engage our attention, and none should receive more earnest and thoughtful consideration, than one which seeks to guard and preserve the high standard of our population and citizenship. No policy, however venerable, no mere sentimental considerations should dissuade us from dealing with an evil which menaces our civilization, and in a manner compatible with the best interests of the country and all its people.

The pending bill, sir, throws an additional safeguard about our population and citizenship by imposing a moderate and reasonable educational test upon all immigrants over 16 years of age and physically capable. The immigrant must be able to read and write the Constitution of the United States in some language before admission. An exception is made, however, in the case of a person over 50 years of age, the parent or grandparent of a qualified immigrant above 21 years of age and who is capable of supporting such parent or grandparent. Although illiterate, such relatives may accompany or be sent for and come to join the family of a child or grandchild over 21 years of age, qualified and capable. A wife or minor child, though unable to read and write, may likewise accompany or be sent for to join the husband or parent who is qualified and capable. The closest and strongest ties of kinship thus remain unbroken.

This measure does not prevent the immigration of the intelligent people of every land who wish to make their homes here, and who will become worthy and desirable citizens of the Republic. It is not racial in its discriminating purpose; it does not forbid the coming of any race; it proscribes no nationality; it is proscriptive of ignorance, and of that only. It is founded upon the broad and patriotic theory that to further augment illiteracy in this country is unwise, and that illiteracy is an unstable and undesirable foundation upon which to rest this mighty fabric of government.

We are not unmindful of the immeasurable contribution which our foreign-born population has made to the upbuilding of the Republic. Its work and influence have been felt throughout the country, and much of all that is great and splendid about us is the fruit of its genius and industry. But those who have aided most were those who quickly blended with the great mass of our native-born population and most readily renounced allegiance to their own countries and assumed the duties of loyal citizens, taking an interest and pride in sustaining and strengthening the institutions of the country of their adoption. Sir, I am pleased to say that the native and foreign born of Indiana have wrought together in raising that splendid State to her present exalted position. They have been zealous co-workers; sharing alike in all the labors, anxieties, and rewards incident to carving out of the wilderness that majestic Commonwealth. Search her muster rolls, and there you will find thousands, born beneath distant skies, who dared all in the defense of the honor and integrity of their chosen land. They shared in the arduous deeds of heroes on many fields and their patriotic devotion is a part of the imperishable glory of the State.

The absorptive power of our nation has been great, and in the main the aliens and the natives have easily fused into a homogeneous people. The rapid admixture of foreign bloods here without the impairment of our national character has challenged the wonder and admiration of the civilized world. James Bryce, a thoughtful foreign student of our institutions and a luminous writer, observes that—

> What strikes the traveler, and what the Americans themselves delight to point out to him, is the amazing solvent power which American institutions, habits, and ideas exercise on newcomers of all races. The children of Irishmen, Germans, and Scandinavians are far more like native Americans than prevalent views of heredity would lead us to expect. Nor is it without interest to observe that nature has here repeated on the Western Continent that process of mixing Celtic with Germanic and Norse blood which began in Britain more than a thousand years ago.

Until recent years immigration was invited and stimulated by liberal homestead laws and by colonization agencies which offered alluring inducements. All who sought our shores were accepted without question or discrimination. The educated, moral, and patriotic were welcome. The culprit fleeing from outraged justice found a refuge here. The physically, mentally, and morally disordered were permitted to become residents and citizens and share with us, as though unto the manor born, the privileges bequeathed to us by our fathers. Our broad, rich, unoccupied domain and expanding industries invited numbers, and no heed was taken of their quality; and it is remarkable, and indeed the subject of congratulation, that we suffered so little from the undesirable and positively objectionable while our gates stood unprotected.

The encouragement of immigration has taken the form of law but once, that was in 1864, and was in the nature of a war measure. It became necessary to supply the places of the Army which had been drawn from the fields of productiveness and sent into the South. This could be done by promoting immigration; hence, the law mentioned. Under the stimulus it afforded, immigration was materially increased. At the close of the war the Army reentered the avocations of peace, and the necessity for the act having ceased, it was repealed four years after its enactment.

Prior to 1875 there were no restrictive laws except those prohibiting cooly-trade. In that year more drastic measures were enacted to suppress this reprehensible traffic, and convicts and women imported for immoral purposes were excluded. Subsequently acts were passed (not including acts restricting Chinese immigration) barring idiots, insane persons, paupers, or persons liable to become a public charge; persons with a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease; persons who have been convicted of a felony or other infamous crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude; polygamists; assisted immigrants (unless it is satisfactorily shown on special inquiry that they do not belong to one of the foregoing excluded classes), and contract laborers.

The presence of these restrictive acts upon the statute books has been beneficial, though the number who presented themselves at our ports and were excluded is comparatively small. Exclusive of the Chinese, there have been debarred and deported during the last six years only 14,156 out of a total of 2,137,659. The unseen benefits arising from these first measures of exclusion, however, are perhaps greater than those which are disclosed by the statistical tables, for many have been deterred from coming by knowledge of the laws and the fear of their enforcement.

It has been observed during recent years that those interdicted under existing laws are not the only persons whose coming is undesirable, and that there has been a decided increase in the influx of people whose presence is injurious. These new and unwelcome accessions are from countries which contributed but little to the earlier immigration. They differ from the former in race and quality. The very large per cent of the immigration, until quite recently, came from the United Kingdom, Germany, Sweden, Norway, and Denmark. It was in the main intelligent, industrious, frugal, law respecting, and liberty loving. It readily assimilated with us and merged into the American with marvelous facility. It contributed to our statesmanship, to our literature, to our commerce, to our agriculture, and to all other avenues of industry. Beginning with the last decade, a change occurred in both the nationality and quality of our immigration. Those who were chiefly of the Slavonic countries began to come in great and increasing numbers. Among them were many very desirable acquisitions; many from the better portions of Italy, Austria-Hungary and other eastern and southern countries were educated, enterprising, and brave, but the larger per cent was ill fitted to become a part of our population or to assume the privileges and responsibilities of American citizens. They possessed a low order of intelligence and an inferior standard of life, and had no adequate conception of the marvelous significance of our institutions. This fact has awakened the people to the necessity of some protective measure.

If it be said that in further restricting immigration we are departing from the traditional policy of our Government, we answer that conditions have changed, and with new conditions the policy of the Government must change to meet them. No policy should stand against the best interests of our countrymen, native and foreign born alike.

It will be instructive to observe the number of immigrants and aliens arriving since the close of the Revolutionary war. There are no statistics prior to 1820, but it is estimated by generally accepted authority that the number between the close of the war of the Revolution and 1820 was 250,000. Since 1820 the arrivals by decennial periods was:

1830, aliens	143,439
1840, aliens	599,125
1860, aliens to 1855; immigrants 1856 to 1860	2,598,214
1870, immigrants	2,314,824
1880, immigrants	2,812,191
1890, immigrants	5,246,613
1891 to 1897 (seven years)	2,741,399
Total immigrants and aliens	18,169,056

The foregoing came chiefly from the countries and in the numbers following:

Germany	4,967,776
Ireland	3,781,043
England	2,636,596
Norway and Sweden	1,182,788
Austria-Hungary	813,259
Italy	804,789
Russia and Poland	714,938
France	393,536
Scotland	367,041
Switzerland	199,246
Denmark	185,654

The radical change which began in 1880 in the nativity of the principal arrivals, may be conveniently observed by forming two principal groups—one embodying the western and northern and the other the eastern and southern parts of Europe. The per cent of immigration from these groups to the total immigration was as follows:

Year.	From United Kingdom, France, Germany, and Scandinavia.	From Austria-Hungary, Italy, Poland, and Russia.

A rise in the ratio of immigration from eastern and southern Europe from 8.5 to 51.7 per cent in seventeen years, and a fall in the ratio from the western and northern countries from 64.5 to 36.7 per cent in the same period, may well lead us to pause and inquire whether the change is in the national interest.

One of the most noticeable incidents in this remarkable change in the source and nativity of the immigrants is the marked addition to our illiterate population. The decrease in immigration has been from countries which have hitherto sent us but a small per cent of illiterates, and the increase is from countries where the ignorance is greatest. Thirty-nine and nine-tenths per cent of those above 14 years of age coming from Austria-Hungary, Italy, Poland, and Russia last year could neither read nor write, while only 3.6 per cent of those from the United Kingdom, France, Germany, and Scandinavia were illiterate. When we witness this increase in the illiterate accessions to our population we may well recall the warning of George William Curtis, "Let us beware how we water our lifeblood." Let us not unduly tax our assimilative powers.

No one can view this great invasion of illiteracy without grave concern. We should address to ourselves the question: What will be its effect if it continues to flow with increasing ratio? The countries which supply the greater number of illiterates furnished less than 1 per cent of the immigration in 1869, 8.5 per cent in 1880, and 51.7 per cent in 1897. The undesirable were deterred less by panic than the desirable immigrants.

Mr. Bryce, with rare felicity, observes the evil which has given rise to the pending bill:

> The most conspicuous evidence of American prosperity—
> Says he—
> has been hitherto seen in the high standard of living to which the native working classes of the North have risen, in the abundance of their food and the quality of their clothing, in the neatness and comforts of their homes, in the decent orderliness of their lives, and the fondness for reading of their women. The settlers of the last half century, though at first far behind the native Americans in all these respects, have tended to rise to their level, and except in a few of the larger cities, have, after fifteen or twenty years, practically adopted American standards of comfort. But with the last decade new swarms of European immigrants have invaded America, drawn from their homes in the eastern part of central Europe by the constant cheapening of ocean transit and by that more thorough drainage, so to speak, of the inland regions of Europe which is due to the extension of railways. These immigrants, largely of the Slavonic race, come from a lower strata of civilization than the German immigrants of the past, and, since they speak foreign tongues, are less amenable to American influences. * * * There seems to be a danger that if they continue to come in large numbers they may retain their own low standard of decency and comfort and menace the continuance among the working class generally of that far higher standard which has hitherto prevailed in all but a few spots in this country. Already the United States, which twenty years ago rejoiced in immigration, begins to regard it with disquiet.

A study of the last census leads to the conclusion that our foreign population contributes a large number to our almshouses, penitentiaries, insane asylums, and reformatories which would be excluded under the provisions of the pending bill. There were in the almshouses, in 1890, 73,045 paupers, of whom 27,648 were foreign-born and 36,656 were native whites. The nationality of 2,274 whites was undisclosed; the residue were colored. It is thus seen that the foreign-born whites constituted 43 per cent and the native whites 57 per cent of the white pauper element whose parentage was known. The full significance of this is realized when we bear in mind the disparity in the respective numbers of our native and foreign population.

Dr. Wines, in his bulletin upon Convicts in Penitentiaries in the United States at the Eleventh Census, says that—

> The foreign population of this country contributes, directly or indirectly, in the persons of the foreign-born or of their immediate descendants, very nearly three-fifths of all the paupers supported in almshouses. This disproportion between the two elements in respect of the burden of pauperism is even greater than that in respect of crime.

The exhibit with respect to the criminal calendar is equally important. There were 57,310 white criminals, 28.25 per cent of whom were foreign-born and 71.75 per cent were native. But those who were of foreign birth or foreign parentage it appears committed 57.56 per cent of the crime.

We may pursue the record further as to juvenile offenders and the insane with substantially similar results. The foreign element is shown to have contributed an undue proportion to each class.

The educational test will have a very direct effect in reducing the number of contributions to the foregoing unfortunate and objectionable classes. It appears that 20.56 per cent of the foreign-born criminals and 30.11 per cent of the foreign-born white paupers were illiterate. A large number of these could not have secured admission to this country under the provisions of the pending bill, and to that extent we would have been relieved of the burden which their coming imposed.

The gravitation of undesirable immigrants into the large cities and their reenforcement of the slum districts is one of the pronounced evils. These slum districts make their ample contribution to the police courts, the workhouses, and the penitentiaries, and are a burdensome tax upon the benevolence and thrift of the community. They are the hotbeds of vice, where American customs and institutions are foreign, and where in many instances the banner of the Republic is not the emblem most honored.

In Baltimore 77 per cent of the total slum population is of foreign birth or parentage; in Chicago, 90 per cent; in New York, 95 per cent, and in Philadelphia, 91 per cent.

It will be seen that the nationalities which constitute the larger per cent of the slum elements are those from which our least desirable foreign population has been drawn recently with increasing ratio; much the greater per cent of it is from the eastern and southern European countries, which contribute most liberally to foreign illiterates. Twenty-three and one-tenth per cent of the illiterates in the slums of the cities named were of Scandinavia, Great Britain, France, Germany, and Ireland, while more than twice that number, or 53.6 per cent, were of Austria-Hungary, Russia, Poland, and Italy. In striking contrast with this is the fact that only 7.4 per cent was composed of native Americans.

The more recent immigration is less devoted to home building than the former. There is a disproportion in the number of the males and females which is noticeable. The arrivals from the United Kingdom, Germany, Sweden, Norway, and Scotland have been composed of substantially an equal number of males and females, while the equilibrium between the sexes from other countries is not observed. They send us 58 per cent of males and only 42 per cent of females. It may be stated as axiomatic that home builders are good citizens, for the government which rests upon the home will the better resist the shock of foreign invasion or domestic tumult. The American home is indeed the cradle of liberty—it is the unit of the Republic's strength. There are taught the lessons which endure. That immigration which does not seek to build homes among us is the most objectionable, and its exclusion will be no loss.

The decline in arrivals since 1892 is readily accounted for and may be regarded as but temporary. The history of immigration discloses the fact that its lines are parallel with those marking our commercial experience—that they rise and fall together. The recent panic checked the foreign currents, but had less effect upon the undesirable than upon the desirable elements. With the complete resumption of our industrial activities we shall see history repeated in the increase of the number of immigrants. With a larger and growing demand for workmen, the newly landed foreigners will rapidly increase to share in the competition.

A patriotic regard for those to whose interests we owe first allegiance requires us to see that the persons who present themselves in this new competition shall not be the most ignorant pauper laborers from abroad. The poorer classes of foreign illiterates are used to conditions with which, happily, our workmen are unfamiliar. Their standard of living and wages is such that they will readily accept lower compensation and harder conditions than our own workmen could or should accept. The natural and inevitable result of their coming will be to depress the wages of labor. A low wage scale is not consistent with the most wholesome development of the country and of its people. The consideration of the pending measure, as Mr. Blaine said of the Chinese exclusion act, "connects itself intimately and inseparably with the labor question."

No statistics are subtle enough to measure the extent of the depression of wages by the increase of the number of wage earners in an already redundant labor market, but that the direct effect is injurious is established by common experience and by numerous specific instances. The fact that wages have been higher during periods of greatest prosperity and largest immigration does not prove that increased immigration did not injuriously affect them. How much higher would they have risen without the added foreign supply and how much longer would the final collapse have been delayed are questions which only can be asked. The special immigration investigating commission of 1895 found that wages have been lower in localities where there has been congestion of migratory Italians, Hungarians, and Slavs, without trade union affiliations, brought in to supplant native labor in Pennsylvania mines. The introduction of machinery enabled the unskilled alien to readily displace native labor. It is estimated that since 1885, 45,000 to 50,000 immigrants were given employment in and about the mines of Pennsylvania, thereby supplanting domestic miners and laborers, who were unable to support home and family on the low wages established by the newcomers. The wages of miners and laborers have suffered as a consequence not only in Pennsylvania, but in Maryland, West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. Other trades, notably the shoe and clothing trades, have been similarly invaded.

The padroni of New York stand ready and anxious to supply foreign labor for many kinds of work, in various sections of the country, at reduced wages.

It was the opinion of the special commission that immigration was not responsible for the depression of 1893–94—> except in so far as the arrival of immigrants just before it and during its continuance swelled considerably the number of its victims. Certainly the industrial state just then did not warrant an increase in population, and that immigrants should have come even in decreased numbers was unfortunate alike for them and for the native poor, of whose scanty relief they had in common humanity to be given a share.

Not the least of the beneficial effects of this measure will be the curtailment of the number of migratory laborers or "birds of passage." They come and go without any intention of gaining a permanent residence. They seek work for a season, or a limited period, live in the meantime in the rudest manner, contribute absolutely nothing to the support of the Government, and take their earnings to spend abroad. They are a continual drain upon the country, and are unfair and unwelcome competitors in the labor markets. The pending measure will exclude a large per cent of these very objectionable elements. Not all will be rejected, as they should be, but any reduction in the number will be a gain in the interest of our own countrymen who are subject to their unfair, temporary invasions.

The evils of immigration have been augmented by improper methods and influences employed abroad. Many unworthy and totally unfit immigrants have been sent or persuaded to come here who would not have come of their own volition. At the present moment the Italian Government is offering exceptional inducements to its subjects to emigrate to America. On the 24th of last October Il Messaggero, a daily newspaper published in Rome, contained this announcement:

> The minister of the interior, having learned that difficulties are encountered in the concession of the discount of 30 per cent upon the railway fares to emigrants, has given instructions that the rules governing the above-mentioned concession shall be observed, notifying, however, that the concession relates only to emigrants for America who embark in the ports of Civitavecchia, Genoa, and Naples.

The means and methods adopted for increasing Oriental immigration are repugnant to our best interests. The slavery which is practiced among the poor Orientals degrades and debauches the immigration system. A systematic attempt is made to evade the sharp scrutiny of the officers at our ports and render abortive existing laws. Paupers once deported have been assisted by Syrian shopkeepers to return and enter upon lives of abject slavery. They have not desired to become naturalized; their stay is but temporary. After improving their fortunes they return whence they came. In the meantime many of them are cared for as charity cases in our hospitals and almshouses. Harriet M. Conner, an intelligent and experienced Syrian missionary, at Pittsburg, writing under recent date, says:

> The really greatest evil, I believe, lies beyond the seas, where interested persons, Mohammedans, Syrians, Armenians, and Greeks, as well as the European agents, are trafficking in this worst kind of slavery. * * * Numbers of these agents, we are told, are Moslems, and are making fortunes by inducing these poor people to leave their own land for America, Brazil, Spanish ports, and elsewhere. They charge them exorbitant rates, accept bribes, keep second-hand clothes shops to sell or exchange Oriental for European clothing, keep restaurants and lodging houses, etc., and the wretched immigrants are impoverished from their very starting point. These evils are so common and so great that volumes might be written of the abuses practiced upon them.

One of our distinguished foreign-born countrymen, whose affections are deeply rooted in his adopted country, says that "foreign criminals, and even destitute and dependent children, are also shipped to the United States and Canada every year by benevolent individuals and associations in Europe." Such unnatural immigration, such forced contribution to our population, is a fraud upon our liberality, degrading to American citizenship, and a menace to our institutions. Immigration which is encouraged by foreign governments, or stimulated by the mercenary agencies which have infested foreign centers of degraded population, is the most undesirable, and we fail in our supreme duty if we do not enact some measure which shall search it out and exclude it.

The advocates of a nonrestrictive policy direct attention to the amount of money annually brought into the country by immigrants and which, inferentially, would be lost to us by further exclusion. The discussion of this important subject should proceed upon a much higher plane than this. Whether a diminution of undesirable immigration will reduce our money supply from abroad is a matter which should receive scant consideration in the presence of the far greater question involving the intelligence and morality of our population and citizenship. But from the standpoint of our merely commercial interests, there will be no material loss, if there is not, indeed, an actual gain.

The money exhibited by immigrants last year at our ports of entry exceeded $3,500,000. How much of it was immediately returned to aid other immigrants is not known, but that a part was returned and used again for similar purposes there is undoubted proof. Against this apparent gain to our currency from abroad should be set the amount which is annually sent and taken to other countries by our foreign population—sent to bring other impecunious immigrants, or to be invested or spent abroad. The amount can be but roughly approximated. It is estimated, however, that there is annually sent to Italy, through Italian bankers in New York alone, between $25,000,000 and $30,000,000. If we are to take into account the money which the immigrant brings, we must, in fairness, also observe the amount he withdraws from us.

The unequal distribution of immigration serves to increase the perils and intensify the demand for some wholesome restrictive measures. During recent years the great mass of the immigration has been but little attracted to the South and West, while it has an increasing tendency to concentrate in the Eastern States and cities. The "birds of passage" can the more cheaply and readily invade the Eastern centers and return. The impecunious and the least enterprising seek the nearest and most available points to the ports of entry. During the last year three out of every four immigrants settled in the East, or, to be more precise, 75.23 per cent located in the North Atlantic States; 3.33 per cent in the South Atlantic; 15.16 per cent in the North Central; 2.45 per cent in the Southern Central, and 3.83 per cent in the Western States. The five States of Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, and Pennsylvania alone received 169,202, or about 73 per cent of the aggregate immigration. It has been conclusively demonstrated that much the larger per cent of the undesirable immigrants is deposited on the Atlantic Seaboard. This makes assimilation more difficult and aggravates the dangers to the present population. A general and equitable distribution of the immigration throughout the various sections of the country would materially tend to minimize the evils which are bred by massing the nationalities together.

The bill before the Senate offers a partial cure for the evils incident to the present immigration system; it is one which is simple and just, and, honestly administered, will go far toward removing the disquiet prevalent throughout the country. The new classification which it makes will result in debarring a large per cent of the most objectionable elements which now have unrestricted admission. It is not claimed that it will discriminate with absolute justice and that only the worthy will be admitted and the unworthy excluded. Some of those who will be denied entrance, though illiterate, would make acceptable additions to our population, but much the larger number would not. Very few of them possess the qualities which would enable them to develop into desirable citizens.

The enforcement of the educational test the past year would have excluded, it is roughly estimated, upward of 37,000 who were admitted. There is no record except of the illiterates above 14 years of age, and these numbered 44,580. There would have been debarred less than 3.6 in every 100 from the United Kingdom, Germany, and Scandinavia; and less than 39.9 in every 100 from Austria-Hungary, Italy, Poland, and Russia. Nearly 99 Germans in each 100 would have been admitted and about 49 Italians; 96 English and 72 Russians; 94 Irish and 61 Poles. It is therefore apparent that the effect of the law would have been inconsiderable upon the immigration from countries whence has been drawn our great stock of desirable immigrants, while it would have excluded a very large number from the countries supplying the most undesirable.

It is urged that this bill does not exclude the most objectionable elements—the anarchists, the agitators, and enemies of social order. Unfortunately this charge is too well founded. Too frequently those who are enemies of the law and seek the subversion of government would be able to comply with an educational test; but should we ignore and make no provision against a lesser evil because, forsooth, we are unable to abate the greater? Not all of those whose tenets are at war with established society are of the educated classes. Some of the most violent ultra-socialists are found among the illiterate industrial laborers in the worst portions of Austria-Hungary, and many of them would be debarred by the requirements of the pending measure.

What could be more in harmony with our institutions than an educational test, for the enduring basis upon which the Republic rests is intelligence? The schoolroom is more potential in our preservation than steel-armored fleets; more essential to our defense than the strongest fortress. A general knowledge among the people of the rudimentary branches of an education is regarded as essential to the safety of our free institutions and necessary for the enjoyment of American citizenship. It is in recognition of these facts that private beneficence has endowed schools and that many States have enacted compulsory education laws and that the people have voluntarily laid upon themselves the burden of instructing the youth of the land. In many of the States the truant officer has become a familiar arm of the law. May we not demand of those without seeking our shores that rudimentary education which we require of our own countrymen within?

Mr. President, the present bill has heretofore received the approval of the Senate. It is born of neither a want of hospitality nor of a nativistic spirit, but of a profound conviction that the illiterate elements which do not make for national betterment should be excluded, and that we should admit only those able to read and write our Constitution and who are enamored of our country and its institutions. Sir, let us exalt American citizenship, the richest legacy which in the divine economy may be bequeathed to the children of men, and preserve undiminished the moral and intellectual grandeur of the Republic.

I submit some statistical tables to be appended to my remarks.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 11, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CANNON, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 6251) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for prior years, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice to the House that my purpose is, to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal, to ask the House to take up and consider this bill in Committee of the Whole.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 151. An act granting an increase of pension to George W. Walton—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 1081. An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to quitclaim and release unto Francis Hall and Juriah Hall and their heirs and assigns all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the east 20 feet front by the full depth of 100 feet of lot 2, in square 493, in the city of Washington, D. C., as laid down on the original plan or plat of said city—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; and pending that, I move that all debate in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall cease at 5 o'clock to-day, when the consideration of the bill shall be resumed in the House; and upon that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. PEARSON. Of course I presume the gentleman's intention is that this time shall be equally divided?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will not be precipitate in demanding the previous question.

Mr. EVANS. I think the gentleman will facilitate his motion by withdrawing, temporarily at least, the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MOODY. There has been a great deal of time given to this discussion——

Mr. PEARSON. Is it understood that the time is to be divided equally?

Mr. MOODY. Of course that is a matter over which I have no control.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I wish to make a single suggestion, with the consent of the gentleman, before he demands the previous question.

Mr. MOODY. I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina, in response to his suggestion, that I have no objection whatever to an equal division of time. But I can not agree to such an arrangement, as he must understand that I have no control of the time. I have no doubt, however, that a proper and equitable division will be made.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. If there is to be a debate for twenty minutes, under the rule, on the proposition submitted by the gentleman for the previous question, I shall defer what I desire to say until a later period.

The SPEAKER. There will be no debate, under the rule.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. There are a number of gentlemen who desire to be heard on this bill. Several of my colleagues from Indiana who differ with me in the views that I have expressed desire an opportunity of being heard on their side of the question. And it strikes me that if a little time is given now, it will be a saving of time hereafter. This subject is bound to come up on other occasions and in various ways; and gentlemen who have an opportunity of expressing themselves with reference to it at the present time will not probably care to be heard again during this session.

I repeat, therefore, that a little additional time—possibly involving the question of a night session for to-night—will save time later on and will be found more satisfactory to the members.

Mr. STEELE. I wish to say that I am one of the colleagues of my friend from Indiana who has just spoken who desires to talk to "the bill," but I have no desire to consume time in discussing a matter now that can be of no possible result whatever in connection with the subject.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I did not have my colleague who has just spoken in mind at the time I made the remark I did, but another gentleman, of considerable ability, who is not at present on the floor and who desires time to be heard.

Mr. STEELE. Well, of course we all admire the ability of our colleague who has spoken, but we will try to take care of ourselves.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana (continuing). I am trying to provide time for gentlemen who may not be so well able to take care of themselves as my colleague.

Mr. STEELE. Well, we will all try to take care of ourselves somehow.

Mr. EVANS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EVANS. Do I understand that there will be no debate allowed on the proposition for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. There can be none, under the circumstances.

Mr. EVANS. Then I only wish to make a single suggestion or observation—not now in order, I know, but to facilitate an agreement, with the consent of my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. STEELE. I have no doubt the gentleman from Massachusetts will yield for that purpose.

Mr. MOODY. Certainly.

Mr. EVANS. There are many of us who do not quite agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts on the subject of the civil-service law, and we have had a good many conferences. It is not desired that there shall be longer debate than to-day on the pending bill. Those who desire to speak more directly to the question itself prefer that the debate should cease now and the question come up at a later date. I am one of those who have given much attention to this subject. My views differ from those of some who have spoken here and somewhat agree with others.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Regular order, Mr. Speaker!

Mr. EVANS. But I think——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] demands the regular order, and of course this motion is not debatable except by unanimous consent. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] asks for the previous question.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. LIVINGSTON) there were—ayes 87, noes 28.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is ordered. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY], closing debate at 5 o'clock.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. LIVINGSTON) there were—ayes 92, noes 85.

Mr. LIVINGSTON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 126, nays 125, not voting 106; as follows:

So the motion to limit debate was agreed to.

At the conclusion of the roll call the following occurred:

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. TATE, is detained at home by the sickness of his daughter. I therefore desire to ask leave of absence for him on that account. If present, he would vote "no" on this question.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. On what ground?

Mr. TALBERT. I was in the Hall of the House, and did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. That does not qualify the gentleman. That does not bring the gentleman within the rule.

Mr. TALBERT. What is the rule, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman listening at the time when his name should have been called?

Mr. TALBERT. Yes.

The SPEAKER. And he did not hear it?

Mr. TALBERT. I did not hear it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman say he was listening at the time when his name should have been called?

Mr. TALBERT. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the name of the gentleman from South Carolina.

The Clerk called Mr. TALBERT'S name, and he voted.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. LINNEY. I heard my name called and failed to vote, but I understand the gentleman from North Carolina would vote "no" if he were here, and so I desire to vote.

Mr. MOODY. I would like to ask what the gentleman's authority for that statement is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see how that can be done.

Mr. McINTIRE. Mr. Speaker, I was absent when the roll was called, and desire now to vote.

The SPEAKER. Under the gentleman's statement, the rule does not allow that.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman listening at the time when his name should have been called, and did he fail to hear it?

Mr. HUNTER. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires the House to understand the point of the rule in this matter. The only exception to the rule is in a case where a gentleman was listening at the time when his name should have been called and did not hear it, the presumption being then that by some accident it was not called; but if he was paying no attention, he is within the rule which does not permit him to vote.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that if paired the gentleman can not vote if he finds how the gentleman with whom he is paired would vote?

The SPEAKER. Precisely; that is the rule of the House.

Mr. HUNTER. Does it follow, Mr. Speaker, that I am under the rule? I failed to hear my name called, and I was listening.

The SPEAKER. That is within the rule. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The name of Mr. HUNTER was called, and he voted "nay."

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. YOUNG, is absent, ill at his home in Pennsylvania, and I ask that he be excused.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The following pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. YOUNG of Pennsylvania with Mr. BENTON.
Mr. MANN with Mr. JETT.
Mr. LINNEY with Mr. SWANSON.
Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH with Mr. MEEKISON.

Mr. GROSVENOR with Mr. NORTON of Ohio.
Mr. HARMER with Mr. MCMILLIN.
Mr. STEWART of Wisconsin with Mr. RHEA of Kentucky.
Mr. MAHON with Mr. LENTZ.

For this day:

Mr. RUSSELL of Connecticut with Mr. CRANFORD.
Mr. KETCHAM with Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri.
Mr. HURLEY with Mr. BRADLEY.
Mr. WEAVER with Mr. CARMACK.
Mr. BARRETT with Mr. HANDY.
Mr. BURTON with Mr. BROUSSARD.
Mr. PEARCE of Missouri with Mr. SULZER.
Mr. BABCOCK with Mr. WHEELER of Alabama.
Mr. BAKER of Maryland with Mr. WILSON.
Mr. NORTHWAY with Mr. YOUNG of Virginia.
Mr. VAN VOORHIS with Mr. LATIMER.
Mr. BROMWELL with Mr. LLOYD.
Mr. SOUTHARD with Mr. EPES.
Mr. KERR with Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana.
Mr. BULL with Mr. MARSHALL.
Mr. LYBRAND with Mr. FITZGERALD.
Mr. TAYLER of Ohio with Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi.
Mr. HEATWOLE with Mr. STALLINGS.
Mr. CONNOLLY with Mr. ERMENTROUT.
Mr. ACHESON with Mr. RICHARDSON, until to-morrow at 2 p. m.
Mr. ODELL with Mr. TATE, for this vote.

Mr. JETT. Mr. Speaker, I voted "nay." I see I am paired with my colleague, Mr. MANN; and therefore I ask that my name be marked as "present."

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, at the proper time I desire to ask for a recapitulation of the vote. I do not know whether this is the proper time.

The SPEAKER. The vote will be recapitulated.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I ask for order; we can not hear.

The Clerk proceeded with the recapitulation of the vote.

During the recapitulation,

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. When there is an error made in the recapitulation, should the attention of the Chair be called to it at the time or after it is over?

The SPEAKER. After it is over.

The recapitulation was continued and concluded.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to change my vote from "nay" to "yea."

The name of Mr. POWERS was called, and he voted "yea."

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to change my vote from "nay" to "yea."

The name of Mr. WHITE was called, and he voted "yea."

Mr. CODDING. Mr. Speaker, I am still recorded as having voted in the negative, notwithstanding the change made a few minutes since.

The SPEAKER. It is changed on the roll.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to change my vote from "nay" to "yea."

The name of Mr. GIBSON was called, and he voted "yea."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I ask for an announcement of the vote?

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 125 and the nays are 125; and the Chair votes in the affirmative, and the motion is carried. [Laughter on the Democratic side and applause on the Republican side.]

The question is now on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BAILEY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. My understanding is that the Chair voted on the roll call. Is that true?

The SPEAKER. No; it is not true.

Mr. BAILEY. My attention was called to it by gentlemen on this side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not vote.

The question was taken on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and it was agreed to.

DEBATE ON THE CIVIL SERVICE.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4751, and all debate has been ordered by the House closed at 5 o'clock. The gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, I think there ought to be an understanding as to the time that is to be consumed in the debate, and there ought to be an understanding that it should be divided equally for and against the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to divide the time impartially.

Mr. PEARSON. That was the understanding.

Mr. QUIGG. We did not succeed in reaching an understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to award the time impartially.

Mr. PEARSON. I should have been obliged to vote against the proposition if I had thought that there was any doubt about an equal division of the time.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, there ought to be some understanding as to the length of time that is going to be taken in these speeches. There are, as I understand, twenty-five or twenty-six names still on the list of those who desire to speak, and if two or three gentlemen are going to occupy an hour apiece, the rest of us will be at a considerable disadvantage.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] was appointed Chairman of this committee, and was called away yesterday morning, but he left a memorandum here that he had made arrangements that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS], who is chairman of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, should be recognized for an hour at any time during the debate, and in carrying out that understanding the Chair proposes to recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania for an hour. The Chair has also made an arrangement with other parties who desire a shorter time that they shall be recognized for a shorter time.

Mr. QUIGG. I have no motion to make; I simply desire to call the attention of the committee to the arrangement.

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that nothing but a sense of duty arising from the position I happen to occupy as chairman of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service would overcome my reluctance to ask the attention of the House upon a question which has been so exhaustively debated. We have advanced far enough in the debate to have a fair view of the line of battle and the character of the forces employed. I desire now, as briefly as I can, to look over the field and see the relative strength of the forces on the respective sides. Nothing was ever clearer than that great differences of opinion exist upon the question of our civil service. The confusion of tongues in the United States on this question has but one parallel as far as I have read, and that is the lingual curse of Babel.

The pendulum of opinion now swings over a very long arc. At one extremity of the arc are those who believe that all the offices in the Government should be filled by recommendations made by statesmen, Congressmen, Senators, and leading politicians, and at the other extremity are those who think that all the offices ought to be filled by what is known as the competitive system in our civil service. These extremes represent two types of men. One imagines that they are making no headway at all unless the boiler is ready to burst; the other that there is no safety in proceeding as long as there is a drop of water in the boiler. But there is, happily, a type and a middle ground whereon it can stand—a rock of reconciliation whereon men of sweet reasonableness can meet and embrace.

While there has been a very earnest and enthusiastic debate upon the question, I trust that in the end the members of this House will come to stand by my side on this middle ground. Those who advocate the competitive system in our civil service are sometimes called civil-service reformers, a title which to some minds carries honor, to others odium. I am indifferent to-day which interpretation prevails, for my views are based upon quite different and quite other considerations. I think all men ought to be reformers, and every man of sense and virtue is to some extent. Macauley was quite right when he said that men were reformers in proportion to their capacity and their courage. But reformers must observe limitations What is very good within, may be very bad beyond certain limits.

I am in favor of the competitive system in our civil service as far as it can be successfully applied, and no farther. I will not uphold any institution merely out of veneration for its name when it ceases to work out the results for which it was established. The boundaries of the system must be fixed by its benefits. It is neither to be commended nor condemned without discrimination. It is not an end in itself, but the means to an end, and the means must be subservient to the end, and not the end to the means. What Mr. Bagehot says of political economy is true of the competitive system:

It is not a questionable thing of unlimited extent, but a most certain and useful thing to a limited extent.

The limits of its usefulness are what we are trying to find and mark out, and in doing this we must not omit to consider any of the circumstances connected with its practical administration. We do not need to be informed by so great a man as Burk that circumstances give to every political institution its distinguishing color and discriminating effect. Circumstances render every political and civil scheme beneficial or noxious. Liberty must surely hold high rank among the blessings of mankind. Yet no man in a lucid interval would felicitate a madman upon his escape from the wholesome restraint of a madhouse, nor would we congratulate a robber on his escape from prison and the recovery of his natural liberty.

Accordingly, in considering the extent to which the system is beneficial, and therefore desirable, we must not limit our view to its isolated defects. We must look to the totality of effect and not turn a blind eye to excellences.

EVILS IN THE CIVIL SERVICE WHICH THE LAW WAS DESIGNED TO CORRECT.

In reply to the assertion many times made in this debate that the condition of our civil service prior to the passage of the act of 1883 was satisfactory, I propose, as the best evidence the subject will admit of, to read to the committee from the report of the Senate committee at the time the act of 1883 was under consideration.

The evils were so crying that Presidents, Cabinet officers, and the common voice of the people, without distinction of party, with united acclaim, called for remedial legislation.

That report says:

Political considerations have come to play the most important part in the distribution of the vast patronage. It has come to pass that the work of paying political debts and discharging political obligations, of rewarding personal friends and punishing personal foes, is the first to confront each President. * * * He is compelled to give daily audience to those who personally seek place or to the army of those who back them. * * * Instead of the study of great questions of statesmanship, of broad and comprehensive administration policy, * * * or the relations of this great nation to the other nations of the earth, he must devote himself to the petty business of weighing in the balance the political considerations that shall determine the claim of this friend or of that political supporter. The office of Chief Magistrate has undergone in practice a radical change.

There has grown up such a perversion of the duties of that high office, such a prostitution of it to ends unworthy the great idea of its creation, * * * that a change has already come in the character of the Government itself, which if not corrected will be permanent and disastrous. * * * The Chief Magistrate of this nation wears out his term and his life in the petty services of party. He gives daily audience to beggars for place and sits in judgment upon the party claims of contestants. * * * The Executive Mansion is besieged, if not sacked. * * * Every Chief Magistrate, since the evil has grown to its present proportions, has cried out for deliverance. * * * The malign influence of political domination in appointments to office is widespread and reaches out from the President himself to all possible means of approach to the appointing power. It poisons the very air we breathe. No Congressman in accord with the dispenser of power can wholly escape it. * * *

When he awakes in the morning it is at his door, and when he retires at night it haunts his chamber. It goes before him, it follows him, and it meets him on the way. It levies contributions on all the relationships of a Congressman's life; summons kinship, friendship, and interest to its aid, and imposes upon him a work which is never finished and from which there is no release. Time is consumed, strength is exhausted, the mind is absorbed, and the vital forces of the legislator, mental as well as physical, are spent in the never-ending struggle for office. It has come to be a widespread belief that the public service is a charitable institution, furnishing employment to the needy and a home to those adrift. * * * The number of those who thus crowd all avenues of approach to places in the public service is constantly on the increase and is daily becoming more importunate. The late Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Windom, is reported to have said that five-sixths of the applicants for office, while he administered the Treasury based their demands not on merit or fitness or character, but on their poverty and incapacity otherwise to obtain a livelihood.

I now read an extract from report (1874) of Civil Service Commission appointed under President Grant's Administration:

When, for example, in 1868 Congress sought information of the abuses in the Departments, a member declared in a speech in the House that "nothing impressed me more with the rottenness and corruption of our present want of system than the tears of those old and faithful servants, who begged that they might not be placed on record as witnesses of the faithlessness of their associates, and that it might not be known that they had been called as witnesses. Nothing but the assurance of secrecy could procure us evidence of how the people were being plundered."

* * * * * * *

And to the facilities afforded for foisting upon the civil service so many broken-down knights of politics, so many servile favorites of great politicians, so many fortunate objects of official sympathy are due the disgraceful facts that, by many at least, the civil service of the nation was regarded more as an asylum for imbeciles and a playground for favorites than as an honorable field of duty and ambition.

* * * * * * *

Outside the great Departments and offices want of integrity might have been the more general evil, but within them the Administration suffered much more from want of capacity. It would have been too disreputable to commend a person known to be dishonest; but persons of influence sytematically foisted their incompetent and unfortunate relatives and favorites upon the public service. Pressure, menace, selfish influence, and sympathy were used to overcome the scruples of a reluctant officer and to gain a Government salary for an unsuccessful cousin or an unemployed friend. It needs but little experience in official circles to learn how many people tremble at the bare suggestion of an economical measure for weeding out incompetents.

* * * * * * *

Large as was the majority of persons of intelligence and capacity in the clerical service, there can be no doubt that the spoils system was tending more and more to convert the Departments into something like asylums for incompetents. Overwhelming evidence might be quoted, but a few sentences from the mass must suffice. A report of a committee of the Thirty-ninth Congress says that "of the officers employed in the New York custom-house, it is believed a majority of them have no special qualifications for their places." In 1867 the chairman of an investigating committee declared in the House, as the result of his inquiry, that, "as a general rule those who for some defect or incorrect habit in mind or character have been unable to succeed in the open competition of business have been forced by their relatives or political friends upon the public service."

In the Fourth Annual Report of the Civil Service Commission, made June 9, 1888, it is stated——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What year?

Mr. BROSIUS. Eighteen hundred and eighty-eight.

Before the enactment of the civil-service act the condition of the executive civil service in the Departments at Washington and in the customs and postal services was deplorable. In the Department of the Treasury 3,400 persons were at one time employed, less than 1,000 of them under authority of law. Of these 3,400 employees, 1,700 were put on and off the rolls at the pleasure of the Secretary, who paid them out of funds that had not by law been appropriated for the payment of such employees. At that time, of a force of 958 persons employed in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, 539, with annual salaries amounting to $390,000, were, upon an investigation of that Bureau, found to be superfluous. For years the force in some branches of that Bureau had been twice and even three times as great as the work required.

Mr. PEARSON. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. BROSIUS. When I have concluded this reading.

In one division there was a sort of platform, built underneath the iron roof, about 7 feet above the floor, to accommodate superfluous employees. In another division 20 messengers were employed to do the work of 1. The committee that made this investigation reported that "patronage"—what is now known as the "spoils system"—was responsible for this condition, and declared that this system had cost the people millions of dollars in that branch of the service alone. So great was the importunity for place under the old system of appointments that when $1,000 and $1,800 places became vacant, the salaries thereof would be allowed to lapse, to accumulate, so that these accumulations might be divided among the applicants for place, on whose behalf patronage-mongers were incessant in importunity. In place of one $1,800 clerk three would be employed at $600 each; would be employed, according to the peculiarly expressive language of the patronage purveyors, "on the lapse."

"In one case," said a person of reliability and of accurate information, testifying before the Senate Committee on Civil-Service Reform and Retrenchment, "thirty-five persons were put on the lapse fund of the Treasurer's office for eight days at the end of a fiscal year to sop up some money which was in danger of being saved and returned to the Treasury." Unnecessary employes abounded in every Department, in every customs office, and in almost every post-office. Dismissals were made for no other purpose than to supply with places the proteges of importunate solicitors for spoils. One collector at the port of New York removed on an average one of his employes every third day to make a vacancy to be filled by some member of the same party who had 'worked to a purpose,' not against the common political enemy, but for his patron, who had succeeded in being appointed over some other member of his own party. Another collector at that port, the successor of the one above referred to, removed 830 of his 903 subordinates at the average rate of 3 in every four days.

Mr. FARIS. May I ask the gentleman from what book or document he reads?

Mr. BROSIUS. I am reading from the annual report of the Civil Service Commission for 1888, data taken from the report of the Senate committee upon the subject at the time the civil-service law was passed.

Mr. FARIS. May I ask the gentleman if that is not the usual adhesion with which this Civil Service Commission binds itself to this system, and always has done so?

Mr. BROSIUS. Not at all.

Mr. PEARSON. I understand the gentleman will yield to me for a question in a moment.

Mr. BROSIUS. When I have concluded reading.

The successor of this collector removed, within eighteen months, 510 of his 892 subordinates, and his successor made removals at the rate of 3 every five days. In its first report the commission said:

It was the expectation of such spoils which gave each candidate for collector the party strength which secured his confirmation. Thus, during a period of five years in succession, collectors, all belonging to one party, for the purpose of patronage, made removals at a single office of members of their own party more frequently than at the rate of 1 every day. In 1,565 secular days 1,678 such removals were made.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. And all from members of the same party.

Mr. BROSIUS. Thus by the most indubitable evidence is it established that crying evils existed in the civil service which demanded remedial legislation.

Senator Pendleton, in the debate on the bill before the Senate, closed his review of the situation in 1882 in these words:

I repeat, Mr. President, that the civil service is inefficient, expensive, and extravagant, and that it is in many instances corrupt. Is it necessary for me to prove facts which are so patent that even the blind must see and the deaf must hear?

* * * * * * *

Mr. President, how can you expect purity, economy, efficiency to be found anywhere in the service of the Government if the report made by this committee to the Senate has even the semblance of truth? If the civil service of the country is to be filled up with superfluous persons, if salaries are to be increased in order that assessments may be paid, if members of Congress having friends or partisan supporters are to be able to make places for them in public employment, how can you expect Senators and Representatives to be economical and careful in the administration of the public money?

Mr. PEARSON. Now, if the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. BROSIUS. I yield with great pleasure to a question relating to this matter.

Mr. PEARSON. Only to this point. If that superfluous number of employees was cut off at that time, how is it that under your system they have nearly doubled since 1883 under the operations of this benign law?

Mr. BROSIUS. Now, let me answer your question, which is a perfectly fair question, as my friend's questions always are when he is at his best. My friend from North Carolina has made that statement so often that he has come honestly to believe it to be true.

Mr. PEARSON. These are the words of the commission, and I tender them to the gentleman now.

Mr. BROSIUS. Will the gentleman let me make my answer in full? It is not suitable to cut it into fragments. It looks better as a whole.

Mr. PEARSON. Oh, it must.

Mr. BROSIUS. The fact is that the mode of ascertaining the growth of the service my friend adopted is not a correct one, because it does not distinguish between the classified and the unclassified service.

Mr. PEARSON. I beg your pardon.

Mr. BROSIUS. One moment.

Mr. PEARSON. As a matter of fact, I confined my remarks exclusively to the classified service and to the four classes of the service as provided for in section 163 of the Revised Statutes. Let us be specific in our statements, and then if they are not well founded they can be specifically refuted.

Mr. BROSIUS. Well, I am glad the gentleman wants to be specific, because those who are on his side mostly prefer to say, Let us not be too accurate.

Mr. PEARSON. Oh, no.

Mr. BROSIUS. I want to settle this question right now. It has been stated repeatedly that, taking the number in the classified service, the number of clerks in the different departmental service in 1883, and the number in the same service in 1896, there was found to be a falling off of about 3 per cent; but taking the unclassified service and making the same computation for the same period of time and it had increased numerically some 66 per cent. The only way that you can arrive at any other conclusion is by confounding the classified and the unclassified service.

Now, I want to read just a paragraph from the forthcoming report of the commission:

The number of those in the seven Executive Departments in 1883, including some not classified until 1883, was 5,513; the number in the eight Executive Departments in 1896 was 5,312—a decrease of 201 clerkships in the last thirteen years. On the other hand, the number in 1873 was 3,318, showing an increase during the ten years from 1873, under what was called the spoils system, of 2,195, or about 66 per cent, while during the thirteen years of the merit system, from 1883 to 1896, there was a decrease of 3 per cent.

Mr. PEARSON. Will not the gentleman accept the last report of the commission, which shows, on page 98, that in these same classes there are 9,810 now employed as against 5,650 in 1883?

Mr. BROSIUS. I do not think so.

Mr. PEARSON. You will not accept the last report of the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. BROSIUS. I do not accept anything that is not correct.

Mr. BUTLER. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROSIUS. I will with pleasure yield to my colleague.

Mr. BUTLER. What did you read from?

Mr. BROSIUS. I read from the statement of the president of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. BUTLER. And he refers to those who at all differ with that system as "spoilsmen?" You said that he calls it the "spoils system."

Mr. BROSIUS. I read his statement to show the increase in the service under the spoils system and the decrease in the numerical strength of the service under the competitive system.

Mr. BUTLER. But does he refer to it as the "spoils system?"

Mr. BROSIUS. Well, my friend——

Mr. BUTLER. Will you answer my question?

Mr. BROSIUS. My friend, that is a matter of opinion. Did you hear the word "spoils" as I read?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir. I did not know whether he referred to it in that way.

Mr. BROSIUS. Yes, he referred to it as the "spoils system." I will be obliged if I may be permitted to proceed. I am always delighted to answer questions that have some relevance to the matter and that will tend to elucidate the matter. I do not mean to be discourteous to my friend.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not suppose that the president of the Civil Service Commission would have used that expression, which seems to be rather a distasteful one.

Mr. BROSIUS. Yes; it is distasteful to a great many of our friends who oppose the civil service. There seems to be a sensitiveness on the part of honorable members about the word "spoils." Still, I think that if a man accepts the principles of the system, he ought to be willing to accept the designation by which the system is known throughout the whole world. The name "spoils" was given the old patronage system by the patron saint of that system. It was baptized in that name. It was thus christened at the baptismal font, and any man who accepts the principles so named ought not to be ashamed of the title by which they are known throughout the world. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. BROSIUS. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman include the Republican party of Pennsylvania as thus belonging to the party of spoilsmen?

Mr. BROSIUS. I do not.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman remember the platform passed by the last Republican convention of Pennsylvania?

Mr. BROSIUS. That is a matter that does not have any relevancy to the present discussion. I should be glad to yield to questions generally if I had the time.

Mr. BUTLER. We will give it to you.

Mr. BROSIUS. Nothing more rejoices me than to yield to questions when I have the time.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BROSIUS. Wait a moment.

Mr. BRUMM. I want to say right here——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BROSIUS. No; I do not, until I have an understanding.

Mr. BRUMM. That is what I want to get at—an understanding. I do not think there will be any disposition to curtail the time of the gentleman, who is chairman of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and I think he ought to have all the time he wants. I think questions of this kind ought to be settled, and I think it will be a saving of time if we should have them disposed of now.

Mr. BROSIUS. If you will have the kindness to let me proceed with the discussion until I have not only my friend's cordial assurance that my time may be extended, but also that of the committee——

Mr. BRUMM. I think there will be no objection to your time being continued.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I move that the gentleman's time be extended until he finishes his speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time will expire in about seven minutes. At the end of that time the Chair will entertain the request.

Mr. BROSIUS. I will proceed with the discussion of the question for that seven minutes.

THE LAW AND PRINCIPLES OF THE MERIT SYSTEM.

In the legislation looking to an improvement in the civil service and in the rules promulgated from time to time for the same purpose Congress and the Presidents have united in declaring certain fundamental principles which are believed to be necessary to an efficient civil service. These principles are nowhere better stated than by Dorman B. Eaton in the Second Annual Report of the Civil Service Commission and in substance reproduced in the Third Annual Report of the Civil Service Commission. I quote from the latter report:

1. That public office is a public trust, which allows no discretion in the appointing power to disregard either the interests of the people or the merits of applicants.

2. That the claim of every citizen for an appointment is strong not in proportion to the influence behind him or to the anxiety of others to get a place for him, but in the measure of the capacity and good character which he tenders in his own person for the salary offered by the Government.

3. That a party is an organization for the convenient expression of the interests and wishes of those who adhere to it. By electing the President and the majority of the members of Congress a party may at once control all legislation and all national policy, a power great and inspiring enough for all worthy ambition and all useful activity. It should rest its appeal to the people for support on the soundness of its principles and the merits of its candidates. It has no right to use official authority merely for its own ends; and consequently, neither the party in power nor a party seeking power nor any public officer whatever can rightfully use the power of appointment, promotion, or removal to reward adherents, to punish opponents, or to control votes.

4. That the political or religious opinions of officials holding places within the classified civil service or any other part of the executive service to which the examinations may be extended are not to be regarded as material; and selections to fill such places should be made solely on the basis of character and capacity for doing the public business, from which it follows that neither work for a party nor servility to its leaders or to great officers can be accepted as good reasons for making appointments to such places, the duties of which should be performed in the same nonpartisan and businesslike manner, whatever party may be in power or whatever may be the politics or religion of the public servant.

5. That the system so long accepted, under which mere recommendations, official favoritism, and political and social influence, not infrequently united with intrigue and corruption, have been efficient for securing appointments, should give place to a system based on character, capacity, and justice, irrespective of political or religious opinions.

6. That recommendations for office, however numerous and from whatever source, have proved to be not only utterly unreliable and unsafe, but in many ways pernicious.

7. And that as a consequence there should be free public examinations for testing character and capacity, together with a rigid enforcement of the duty of the appointing officer to fill the vacancies by selecting those whose superior merit has been demonstrated by the examinations, without regard to political or religious opinions.

No words of mine could add anything of value to this comprehensive statement of the principles of the system we advocate.

THE INTENT OF THE LAW AS TO EXTENSIONS.

It has been stoutly asserted in this debate that the authors of the law never intended it to cover so large a portion of the civil service as it now does. But this contention is overthrown by the terms of the law itself. No words could more distinctly express the intention that the system should progressively expand to cover larger and larger portions of the service as experience demonstrated its benefits than those used in the law. But we are not left to divine the intention of the lawmakers from the wording of the law. The matter is made entirely clear by the views expressed at the time by Senators and Members in the debate as well as of other evidences of contemporaneous construction.

Senator HOAR said:

Next, the bill commends itself to my judgment because it proceeds with a statesmanlike caution in making the necessary experiment and proceeding from step to step. It is applicable to only a few of the great public offices in the country besides the seven Departments existing in the city of Washington. It applies, I think, to about thirty offices only out of Washington and to the Departments here, and it permits the President, if he sees fit, to extend gradually, as experience shall warrant, there being full opportunity for the legislative power to amend or supply any defects in this bill hereafter, until finally, if it is found expedient, it shall embrace the entire civil service of the country so far as it can be properly applied.

Senator Dawes said:

It can no longer be that 200,000 officeholders can be appointed in the methods that were fit and proper for the appointment of 1,000. Two hundred thousand in the very near future are to be appointed to administer the offices of this Government from Maine to the Gulf, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, over an area thirty times as great as that for which the system itself was created; for administering a Government the yearly receipts and expenditures of which are $300,000,000, to be collected from points a thousand miles from the eye of appointing power here, when in the beginning it was only to disburse three millions and a half among officeholders in the old thirteen States along the line of the Atlantic coast.

Representative Buckner:

I want to say that I am for this bill not so much for what it contains as for its promise of good things in the future. It is but an entering wedge, I hope, to break down the most iniquitous system which has existed in this country for the last forty years, having as its motto "To the victors belong the spoils." The public sentiment is now drifting in the right direction, and I am willing to give my support, and that fairly and fully, to this entering wedge, to this beginning of reform throughout the civil service of this country.

President Grant's message, December 2, 1872:

An earnest desire has been felt to correct abuses which have grown up in the civil service of the country through the defective method of making appointments to office. Heretofore Federal offices have been regarded too much as the reward of political services.

Committee report accompanying the civil-service act, explaining the scope of the law:

But the subordinates in the Executive Departments, whose duty is the same under every Administration, should be selected with sole reference to their character and their capacity for doing the public work. This latter class includes nearly all the vast number of appointed officials who carry into effect the orders of the Executive or heads of Departments, whether in Washington or elsewhere.

Senator HAWLEY:

I propose to show that we have here a reasonable, simple, practical bill, open to no constitutional objection, not in any sense experimental, based upon absolute conclusive experience, capable of being easily and economically executed, that will vastly improve the whole civil service of the country.

IMPROVEMENT IN THE CIVIL SERVICE UNDER THE LAW.

Another assertion made with great confidence by honorable members who are seeking the overthrow of the competitive system in our civil service is that there has been no improvement in the service since the passage of the act of 1883. In order that there may be no lack of proof to remove the doubts which may find an asylum in the mind of anyone who has not given attention to this subject, I will read from the utterances of a few of our statesmen and executive officers who have had experience under that law and are conversant with the state of the service.

William Windom, late Secretary of the Treasury, said:

The beneficial influences of the civil-service law in its practical workings are clearly apparent. Having been at the head of the Department both before and after its adoption, I am able to judge by comparison of the two systems, and have no hesitation in pronouncing the present condition of affairs as preferable in all respects. * * * Under the instrumentalities which are now used to secure selections for clerical places, the Department has some assurance of manly capacity and also moral worth, as the character of the candidates is ascertained before examination.

Benjamin F. Tracy, ex-Secretary of the Navy, said:

The persons appointed under this system are unquestionably more efficient, as a whole, than those selected under any system of pure patronage.

John W. Noble, ex-Secretary of the Interior, said:

The Department of the Interior, with its 7,500 clerks, could not be run six months without the great body of the employees being under the civil-service rules.

Wilson S. Bissell, ex-Postmaster-General, said:

Another year's experience has served only to strengthen the conviction expressed in my last annual report as to the excellent working of the civil-service law in the Post-Office Department, and my desire to see its operation extended to every branch of the postal service to which such extension is practicable.

The General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, in his report for 1894, states:

The civil-service laws and regulations as applied to the Railway Mail Service accomplish all the most sanguine expected. * * * In the judgment of this office the present efficiency could not have been obtained under any other method.

In referring to the great improvement in the Railway Mail Service since the classification of that service, ex-Postmaster-General Wilson S. Bissell said:

This record is unprecedented in the history of the service and renders comment upon the effect of the civil-service law upon it unnecessary.

It is not possible for any man to have given any study to the history of our civil service for the last fifty years without being profoundly impressed with its improvement in economy and efficiency under the reformed system; but not only has the civil service been improved, but politics and legislation as well. I need add nothing to what I have already said on the subject of the civil service but a word in relation to the improvement in our politics.

Mr. PEARSON. Why does not the gentleman abandon ancient literature, come down to modern times, and read modern history? Does he not know that every member of the present Cabinet, of William McKinley's Cabinet, recommends that changes be made in the rules applying to each of the several Departments, and that the Secretary of the Interior recommends that fifty-four classes or descriptions of employees in that Department be excepted from the operations of the law? [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

Mr. BROSIUS. Do not take any of my time by violence. My reply to that inquiry is that the present heads of the bureaus are of the same opinion as the heads of the bureaus under the Administration to which I have referred. There has not been an Administration since this law went into operation that has not with one voice produced the same kind of testimony; and the fact that some of the heads of the Departments now think, as I think, as my honoroble friend from North Carolina thinks, and many of us, that some offices now in the classified service would be better out does not militate against my position at all.

Mr. PEARSON. On the contrary, the gentleman's letter shows that he did not want any change at all.

Mr. BROSIUS. My letter shows nothing of the kind. I am very sorry that my friend from North Carolina, who lives in a community in which there are 300 revenue officers taking charge of distilleries and performing a public service——

Mr. PEARSON. And all acting as a Democratic campaign committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROSIUS (continuing.) Three hundred men there performing a public service who he says are not fit for that service, and yet a Republican Administration permits them to remain there.

Mr. PEARSON. And the gentleman says that they ought not to be examined as to their fitness and prove their merit, and others must prove it.

Mr. BROSIUS. They are examined every day as to their fitness; they have been examined every day that they have been in the service, just the same as the lawyers at your bar are examined as ot fitness every day that they practice law. [Applause.] You put the tyro through an examination before you admit him to the bar, but you do not subject the old practicing lawyers to an examination before they are permitted to continue their practice. Examinations are for the purpose of ascertaining prima facie fitness, but if they are in before the system goes into operation, and have demonstrated their fitness, what good would an examination do?

Mr. PEARSON. Does the gentleman think that deputy collectors ought to be included in the service?

Mr. BROSIUS. That question is not before the House.

Mr. BRUMM. Why do you not answer it?

Mr. PEARSON. It is a question that is before the whole world to-day.

Mr. BROSIUS. I am not discussing all the questions before the whole world. [Laughter.] The limits of my time on this occasion forbid any such arduous task.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I move that the gentleman's time be extended indefinitely, until he closes his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been understood that the time should be divided equally between those who wish to speak in criticism of the law and those who wish to speak in favor of it; but the gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS] be extended until he concludes his remarks.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a single suggestion. General debate is to close at 5 o'clock and it is important that each side should have its fair share of the time, and therefore I think that in giving consent there ought to be some limitation. I think my friend will see the appropriateness of that, otherwise there will be a complaint by and by that some men have been crowded out. Personally I should have no objection to the gentleman taking all the time that he wishes.

The CHAIRMAN. There will be one hour remaining for those who want to speak in favor of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I think it ought to be taken into consideration that there have been three speeches made against the civil-service law to one in its favor.

Mr. PEARSON. That is about the proportion of your strength.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. That is to be determined hereafter.

Mr. STEELE. Gentlemen in favor of civil-service reform took up an hour this morning——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. If the Chair will kindly determine who has the floor——

Mr. STEELE. I have as much right to the floor as my colleague, and shall exercise my right.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The difference between my colleague and myself is that I had been recognized and he had not been. The gentleman seems not to understand the amenities of debate.

Mr. STEELE. I do not understand that the gentleman was recognized, and he has no right to interject his remarks when he has not the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the extension of the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I want to make an inquiry. When is the vote to be taken on this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The debate closes at 5 o'clock. Whether the House will then vote or adjourn the Chair is not informed.

Mr. BROSIUS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am very sensible of the courtesy which the committee has extended to me, and I will try very hard to conclude my remarks as swiftly as I can. Returning from this digression, let us take up the discussion in its logical order.

IMPROVEMENT IN OUR POLITICS.

It is quite within the memory of the youngest member how under the old system the employees of the Government placed in office by the party to which they belonged were subject to assessments to defray party expenses out of their hard earnings, and their contributions were ofttimes wrung from them under the terror of dismissal on failure to respond. I will give you an example of the agencies employed by politicians to secure donations from Government employees. I read a notice once sent to an employee by a prominent politician:

DEAR SIR: Our books show that you have paid no heed to either of the requests of the committee for funds. The time for action is short. I need not say to you that an important canvass like the one now being made requires a great outlay of money, and we look to you as one of the Federal beneficiaries to help bear the burden. Two per cent of your salary is ——. At the close of the campaign we shall place a list of those who have not paid in the hands of the head of the Department you are in.

Yours truly, ——.

If there ever was a practice more reprehensible than that I have not discovered it. The civil-service law put an end to that infamy and stopped the cruelty of stifling the opinions of men and extorting money from them at the peril of losing their places and their bread. Under the old system Senators and Representatives, executive officers, and others high and low were engaged in soliciting funds for party purposes from the clerks and the employees of the Government. The buildings and apartments where the Government work was done, our great Government workshops, were made the rendezvous of those who made these exactions and conducted these inquisitorial agencies for political sinews of war. All this was stopped by the act of 1883, but I have no doubt that were we to return to the old system, as some are inclined to do, all these evils would return also and our Government be again subjected to scandal and reproach.

IMPROVEMENT IN OUR LEGISLATION.

But legislation has also been improved. Members and Senators, not having all their time preempted by seekers for office, have had some time to bestow upon their constitutional duties in the legislation of the country. Dr. Andrew D. White, our present minister to Germany, tells of a member of Congress with whom he conversed on an important measure. This was under the old system. He asked the Congressman why he did not make a great speech, educate the country, and extend his fame. The oppressed statesman, holding out a bundle of letters, replied: "I can not do it, sir. I have not the time. Here are fifty unanswered letters from my constituents asking me to get offices for them."

The burdens of Congressmen are still great enough in this particular, notwithstanding the competitive system has relieved us of so large a part of the strain. It would be better still if the law or public opinion would constrain members from interference with executive functions and require them to attend to their legislative duties, and thus afford the executive officers of the Government an opportunity to discharge their duties unaffected by the constraint of political duress, importunities, and solicitations. If this change could be brought about, our civil service would soon be divested of its political character and the great business plants of the Government would be as free from politics as are the great business and mercantile establishments under individual and corporate management and the régime of spoils, inefficiency, and extravagance in our civil service would end and an era of business management, economy, efficiency, integrity, and honor would ensue.

In holding these views I have the happiness to know that I am in full unity with distinguished members of both sides of this Chamber. No one has given more graceful or forceful expression to them than the honorable member from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. In the last Congress, in a debate on an appropriation bill, he said:

Patronage is a disadvantage to parties and to individuals. I have been so deeply impressed with this belief that since I have been a member of this House I have proposed more than once to relieve the members of this House from the distribution of patronage, for I believe there is no greater curse upon Congressional service to-day than the constant annoyance to which we are subjected in seeking offices for our friends and constituents.

I believe, sir, that the Constitution makers were wise when they lodged these appointments in the executive department of the Government, subject only to the advice and consent of the Senate. They provided that as to inferior officers Congress might lodge the appointments in the heads of Departments or in the courts of law, but nowhere was there any suggestion that members of Congress might become responsible for their distribution. Appointment to office is purely an executive function, and ought never to be a part of a legislator's duty. It has been the experience of almost every man in this Hall to see the appointment of a fourth-class postmaster more potent in the renomination and reelection of a member than his position upon a great public question.

You gentlemen can calculate that every post-office appointment in every district in this country where the parties are at all closely divided will cost you not less than from five to ten votes. There are fifty or sixty districts where the normal majority is less than a thousand, and in almost every one of those districts the disappointed applicants for office and their friends will be sufficient to reverse the verdict given in your favor at the last election. For the last eight years, at the Congressional election succeeding the election of a President, the party in power has met defeat. You will not escape it next year, and it would be to our advantage to multiply these offices, because the more of them there are the more bitter will be your struggle and disappointment over them. I know that patronage is not to your advantage. On the contrary, I know, and every gentleman who sits within the sound of my voice knows, that it is to your disadvantage. First, it is a disadvantage to you gentlemen in your Congressional primaries, and next, it is a disadvantage to your party in the Congressional elections.

Mr. Speaker, I have never been able to see any reason why members of this House should desire to control these offices. It either breeds a sense of dependence on the part of the Representative toward the Administration, or, if it does not do that, it constantly provokes conflicts, for there is nothing more certain than that whoever has influence with the Administration must permit the Administration to have influence with him. Whenever a self-respecting Representative defies the Administration, he will find in the nature of things the Administration discriminating against his friends. I undertake to say that, with the rare exception of bitter divisions on great public questions, more animosities have been engendered between the executive and the legislative branches of the Government by controversies growing out of the single question of patronage than by all other questions combined.

It was a quarrel over the distribution of patronage that drove from the Senate the most brilliant man who has occupied a seat in that body from the great State of New York in thirty years. It was the heat of that quarrel that inflamed the mind of a madman to shoot down a great President. Members of this body have been alienated from personal friends in their own State delegations by controversies growing out of the question as to who should control appointments. These offices are a very apple of discord, and if we sought party advantage we would multiply these appointments, because we would thus aggravate the divisions among you and render it the more certain that the Democratic party will displace, in the next Congressional election, the Republican majority that now dominates this House.

Some have gone to the length of advocating a law forbidding members soliciting appointments, promotions, or removals, in order to relieve appointing officers. Senator Sherman, in debate, said:

There is another law that I am in favor of. It is said that removals are made without cause. Well, sir, if removals are made without cause, in nine cases out of ten they are made upon the solicitation of members of Congress. I say that without fear of contradiction. Nine out of ten of the removals without cause are made because there is a pressure brought upon members of Congress to induce removals, and demands are made by members of Congress, both Senators and Representatives, upon the President and heads of Departments to appoint men for them to office.

Nor is this confined to one party, either, even in a Republican Administration; that is the fact. Now, if any law will guard against that, it ought to be passed. One law which would be as wise as any other would be to forbid members of the legislative department of the Government from even applying to the Departments for any position or any office.

ECONOMY OF THE COMPETITIVE SYSTEM.

The history of our civil service is fruitful in illustrations of the economy of the competitive system. In reply to the impeachment of the figures given by the Civil Service Commission by my friend from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON], I reproduce the following letter from the president of the Civil Service Commission, to be followed by a statement showing the increases and decreases in the clerical force of the several Executive Departments in the years named:

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., January 11, 1898.

SIR: This commission has the honor to invite your attention to some remarks of the Hon. Mr. PEARSON in the House of Representatives on the 5th instant, as published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date. Mr. PEARSON'S statements were made in commenting on an extract from the last report of this commission relative to the growth of the classified and unclassified branches of the service in the Departments at Washington, in which the commission stated that from statistics compiled it was shown that the positions originally classified in Washington had not increased in number since the enactment of the civil-service law, while the positions not subject to the competitive examinations of the commission had increased 37 per cent in number, and 43 per cent in salaries during the same period.

In commenting upon the extracts which he read from the report of the commission, Mr. PEARSON made the following statements:

1. The only trouble with the declaration of the Civil Service Commission—and I say this deliberately—is that it is not true.

2. Now, as to the question of economy. When the law went into operation there were in this Government, in all of its branches, in the civil service, 110,000 people, an increase, as I stated to the gentleman from Massachusetts, of 66,000 people. The payments in 1883 amounted, approximately, in the civil service, to $68,000,000; to-day they amount to $100,000,000. In the departmental classified service, according to the act of 1883, there are employed 5,650; there are to-day, as the gentleman knows, in the same departmental service 53,100 persons employed.

3. If economy has been your main motive, then your main motive in the passage of this bill has failed.

In reply to the first quoted statement of Mr. PEARSON denying the correctness of the commission's figures, the commission has the honor to state that the positions in Washington originally classified were nearly all clerical positions, although there were some technical and scientific places among them, which, however, were relatively very small in number. In the accompanying table is shown by Departments the number of clerks in 1873; the number in 1883, and the number in 1896. These tables were prepared from the official registers, and must therefore be regarded as substantially correct. It will be observed that from 1873 to 1883, covering a period of ten years of the so-called spoils system, the number of clerks increased from 3,278 to 5,523, which is an increase of 2,245, or 68 per cent; while from 1883 to 1896, or during the thirteen years of the merit system, the number of classified clerks decreased from 5,523 to 5,312, a reduction of 211, or over 3 per cent.

Had the classified clerkships in Washington increased in number during the last thirteen years at the same rate as the clerical positions increased during the preceding ten years, it would require an additional expenditure for salaries of the clerks in this city amounting to over $4,000,000 annually. On the contrary, from 1883 to 1896 there was an actual decrease in the number of classified clerks as well as in the salaries paid, while the unclassified and other positions not subject to competitive examination until within the last two years increased 37.6 per cent in number and 43 per cent in salaries during the same period.

Mr. PEARSON refers to increases which he found in the Patent Office, Bureau of Engraving and Printing, Office of the Supervising Architect, Office of the Auditor for the State and other Departments, and General Land Office. It has not been claimed by the commission that there have not been increases in the original classified places in some of the bureaus, but these have been offset by decreases in other bureaus, and the number of places first classified in Washington is substantially the same as it was in 1883. Increases have occurred in some bureaus and offices, according to the actual needs of the service, and are easily explained. The increase in the number of examiners at the Patent Office is the result of the increase in the number of inventions during the last thirteen years. As shown by the Patent Office reports, the work done by that office since 1883 is equal to all of the work done by the office previous to that date. There were, in round numbers, 300,000 patents issued up to 1883. There have been up to date over 600,000 patents issued. It should be stated that the Patent Office has had a system of examinations for the last thirty years, and before the civil-service law was passed the technical positions in that office were not subject to political influence like the clerical and other nontechnical places in the Department.

The force of examiners, as claimed by the Commissioners of Patents, was barely adequate to carry on the work of the office. The Patent Office therefore did not have a surplus of examiners in 1883, and the increases in the force during the last thirteen years have become necessary on account of the increased work arising from the enormous growth of the patent business and the wide field of search required of examiners in handling cases. In this connection it should be stated that as the Patent Office is on a paying basis the increase in the examining work results in an increase in the revenue of the Government.

On the other hand, as showing the little need of increasing the clerical positions when there was a surplus of clerks, it may be stated that there has been a remarkable growth in the postal business since the enactment of the civil-service law, yet the tables show that in 1883 there were 308 clerks employed in the Post-Office Department and 417 in 1896, an increase of only 6 per cent. The work in that Department, therefore, has increased out of all proportion to the increase in the force of clerks. During the ten years preceding the enactment of the civil-service law the force of clerks in that Department increased in number 45 per cent.

The increases in the Supervising Architect's Office were practically all made before the positions in that office were brought within the provisions of the civil-service rules. It may be stated that the office was not classified until 1896.

The increases in the Department of Agriculture have been the result of legislation, that Department having been created since the enactment of the civil-service law, with a field of scientific employment not previously assigned to any of the other Departments, except in a limited way to the former Commissioner of Agriculture.

With respect to the increase of the force in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, one item may be mentioned in explanation of this increase: The work of engraving the postage stamps, previously done by contract, was in July, 1894, assigned to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and in consequence there was a necessary increase of about 200 in the force of that Bureau, but this expense was saved on the work done by contract.

With respect to the statement of Mr. PEARSON relative to the growth of the number of positions in the Government service from 110,000 in 1883 to 178,000 at present, it is difficult to see what bearing this statement has upon the economy and efficiency of the classified service.

During the period mentioned by him the number of postmasters increased from 46,820 to 71,022. A very large proportion of the growth referred to by him therefore was in postmasterships, which are not covered by the civil-service rules. Many of the positions which have increased in number since 1883 were not included in the classified service until May, 1896. Mr. PEARSON states that the classified departmental service has increased from 5,650 in 1883 to 53,100 at present, but he does not mention the fact that the classified departmental service in 1883 referred only to the clerkships in Washington and to a few technical and scientific positions in the Departments in this city, while the classified departmental service to-day comprises the positions in the several Executive Departments, commissions, and offices in the District of Columbia, the Railway Mail Service, the Indian Service, the several pension agencies, Steamboat Inspection Service, Marine-Hospital Service, Light-House Service, Life-Saving Service, the several mints and assay offices, the Revenue-Cutter Service, the force employed under the custodian of public buildings, the several subtreasuries, the Engineer Department at large, and the Ordnance Department at large.

Most of these branches were not classified until May, 1896. The number of positions, therefore, in the departmental service has been increased as the number in the unclassified service has been diminished. The growth of one has been at the expense of the other, but this fact is not brought out in the statement of Mr. PEARSON.

The third quoted statement of Mr. PEARSON is as follows: "If economy has been your main motive, then your main motive in the passage of this law has failed." There is no doubt that economy was one of the motives that impelled the advocates of the civil-service law to have it placed on the statute books, and it is not seen how it can be successfully disputed that the law is not an economical one.

It was never contended by the advocates of the law that it would absolutely stop increases in classified positions, but it was claimed that unnecessary increases in positions would be checked, improved methods would be adopted, and superfluous work would be no longer done. These results have in a large measure been accomplished, as stated in the reports of the various officials of the Departments. For instance, in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, one of the offices referred to by Mr. PEARSON, where an increase of force was noted by him, it may be stated that the Chief of that Bureau remarked in his annual report that the force has increased 11 per cent, while the work has increased 77 per cent. The increase in the work is largely in excess of the increase in the force, which is an evidence that economy and efficiency have resulted from the application of the civil-service rules to that office, which was admitted to be crowded with unnecessary employees before the civil-service law was passed.

The Railway Mail Service furnishes another striking example of the working of the civil-service rules. The report of the General Superintendent for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1897, shows that the number of pieces of mail distributed in 1889, when the civil-service rules were applied, was 7,020,857,130, while in 1897 the number of pieces distributed was 11,571,540,680. During the same period the number of railway mail clerks increased from 5,448 to 7,573. This is an increase of 39 per cent in the clerks and of 77 per cent in the number of pieces of mail matter distributed. The number of errors in distribution in 1889 was 1 in 3,954 pieces of mail distributed, while there has been such a steady improvement in the efficiency of that service under the civil-service rules that the number of errors in 1897 was only 1 in 11,000 pieces of mail distributed.

It will thus be seen that there has been an extraordinary increase in the accuracy with which the work is now being done in that service. It should be stated that the Railway Mail Service has a larger proportion of appointees through the examinations of the commission than any other branch of the public service.

The commission has taken the liberty of dwelling at considerable length on this question of economy and efficiency in the service, as it is satisfied from the data at hand and the reports of officials that the application of the civil-service rules to the public service is resulting in an annual saving of millions of dollars.

Very respectfully, JOHN R. PROCTER, President.

The figures given in the above table were prepared from an examination of the official registers of the United States. There may be some slight variations from these figures by comparison with the registers of the several Executive Departments, but it is not believed that any material discrepancies will be found.

A LATER ILLUSTRATION.

But the most authentic as well as the most recent testimony on the subject is found in the records of this House near the close of the last Congress. On the 20th of February, 1897, in a debate on an appropriation bill, the following dialogue took place, and I cite it to show, what goes without saying, that when we have the chance to make appointments, our friendship, generosity, and benevolence get the better of our duty, and we place a friend where we can, without a scrupulous regard to his qualifications or his necessity to the service. On page 2174 of the RECORD of the last session, Fifty-fourth Congress, I find the following:

Mr. CANNON. In the last Congress, in the Congress before that, in every Congress that I have served in, there have been at least one-third more employees than enough to do all the work. We have not cut them off, we are not going to cut them off, whichever party is in power. The employees are around, they render themselves personally agreeable, and in this House of Representatives we desire to accommodate each other and to accommodate the employees without reference to which party dominates here.

Let me call attention to a few facts. Here in the document room they had enough employees to run the business of that room without Joel Grayson, but they did not do it. He was appointed. You all understand who he is. In sheer self-defense he was employed to work in that room, and he gets, I believe, $1,500 a year.

Again, in this very room where Mr. Stickney was employed, there were enough employees there for one to have been detailed to do this work, but that was not done. Stickney was informed that he could go in there and work and take his chances of being paid. He was out of a job, he was thoroughly competent, and he relied upon the assumed fairness of the House to pay him if he went in and did the work; and he doing work which under proper administration somebody else might have done, the months passed on, and we put this item in the bill, but it is subject to the point of order.

Take another case. The gentleman from Ohio brought in an item of $500 to pay this young man in the file room. He did the work, but why was it necessary for him to do it? On inquiry we found that the employees there wanted three or four months' vacation, and bundled up and went off, and this poor boy, being quite as competent as any of them, went in and did the work and took his chances of being paid. The committee did not feel like turning him down, and the point of order was not made on that item.

Again, take those two boys whose item went out on a point of order. They are laborers who have been attending to two large committee rooms. They have been there for years, and this allowance—$75, I believe—I believe has come to be the yearly provision for each of them. That item went out on a point of order, and rightfully when the point was made. Now, I have stated very frankly why these items were put in the bill, and I trust that if any of them go out, they will all go out.

Mr. MOODY. Whose fault is it that we have this superfluous number of employees?

Mr. CANNON. It results from the desire of members of this Congress and the desire of members of the last Congress and the desire of members of every Congress in which I have served to have their friends appointed on the House force somewhere.

Mr. FLETCHER. By whom were they appointed?

Mr. CANNON. By the Clerk and by the Doorkeeper and the officers generally. It is so now, it always has been so, and I suspect that as long as human nature remains as it is it will continue to be so, at least during the gentleman's lifetime and mine. That is all I have to say about it.

That these abuses were much greater before the inception of the existing law there is no doubt. This is what Senator Sherman said in a speech in the Senate in 1870:

Every man of sense knows that he can go to any of these Departments and cut off one-half of the clerical force, and yet have a sufficient force to perform all the duties. If others do not know it, I, at least, have a very strong conviction on this point. There is scarcely a Department of this Government in which, if conducted by a private individual as he would conduct his private business or the affairs of a private corporation, he would not only reduce the compensation of these employees, but reduce largely the number of the employees. Who does not know that this is so in every one of the Executive Departments?—Congressional Globe, 1870, page 3846.

On the 23d day of February, 1897, in the same debate, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] submitted these observations:

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it is said that one fact is worth a thousand arguments; and, furthermore, one fact that is within the knowledge of every man of a large assembly like this that I am addressing is doubly valuable. I submit to this House that there are no three men in it who are men of higher integrity, ability, patriotism, and industry, and more self-sacrificing to their country, than the gentleman from Maine, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DINGLEY], the chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations [Mr. CANNON], and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], chairman of that committee when the Democrats are in power.

I ask this House to call to mind what has been the action of the last two named under the fatal spell of this vile spoils system of officeholding; what is their testimony in their acts? Only last Saturday the chairman and ex-chairman of that great committee had to stand on this floor and tell us that this House was wasting one-fourth of the public money, spent on this House in plain robbery of the people, of their money paid in taxes; I make the point that this money was spent corruptly, because whenever a man is employed unnecessarily, wastefully, in the service, as they said one-fourth of them were, then the members of this House did spend the people's money corruptly. Mr. Speaker, we could better spare any ten men out of this House than either one of those men, and yet they reported a bill here carrying about $25,000 in violation of the law, consciously, deliberately, and doing it to gratify the desire for the spoils of office of us members of Congress under this despicable, nasty, vile spoils system, defended on this floor by honorable men. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I submit this without note or comment.

CHARACTERISTIC ARGUMENTS.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to relieve the gravity of the discussion, let me allude to some of the arguments advanced in favor of the proposal to repeal or modify the civil-service law. It is consoling to hear honorable members, who are insisting upon taking half of the civil service of the country out of the classification, making liberal concessions to the excellence of the competitive system. Their protestations of devotion to merit, taken in connection with their assaults upon the merit system, place them somewhat in the attitude of the Irishman who took a pledge of total abstinence with reservations. He excepted from the obligations of his pledge a dozen different kind of drinks each day, drinks on occasions of weddings and christenings, and whenever the priest would absolve him from his obligation, and drinks wherever they were kept and sold. In other words, his total abstinence was intended to be only between drinks. So our friends, who in one breath praise the merit system and in another decry its administration, desire it to be applied to the service with reservations; that is to say, reserving and excepting about 40,000 places now in the classification.

Some of the arguments advanced, it must be admitted, are more amusing than convincing. In many instances they not only merit criticism but provoke indignation. The grossest exaggeration is employed to make out a case that will arrest somebody's attention. Defects are massed and exhibited in clusters for dramatic effect. Everybody knows that where defects which in their natural distribution are unnoticed, when removed from their settings and massed may arrest some attention, not being counteracted by the body of excellences with which they are mingled in their ordinary state. If a foreigner came to this country and visited only the jails and asylums, he might say that this is a nation of criminals or of defective classes. But we would say he was a fool. That is not the way to arrive at truth. Proportion must be observed. You can not estimate error rightly excepting in relation to the body of truth with which it is related. I heard of a man who made a very delusive draft of his farm by not drawing the parts on the same scale. If you were to make a map of your State with the swamp land drawn on a scale of 1 mile to the inch and the remaining portion 20 miles to the inch, the State would be nearly all swamp.

So to heighten the effect of the presentation a number of instances of alleged wrongdoing and unsuitable operation of the law or the rules, gathered from a wide area and a long period of time, most of which are pure fictions, are recited, and with the aid of rhetorical embellishments are held before the astonished gaze of a credulous, misled, and deluded, but sympathetic public, as Cicero exhibited the rags and the wounds to the jury to excite their abhorrence of a crime that had not been proven against the accused. They bring to the discussion a picturesque collection of epithets as "colossal hypocrisy," "monumental fraud," "stupendous humbug," as if they believed with Napoleon that governments are run by epithets.

JESTING AND RIDICULE.

Occasionally we find an honorable member treating the competitive system as if it was fair game for the jester, classing civil service and the sea serpent in the same category as equally legitimate prey for the limp-minded humorist of the silly season. [Laughter.] A distinguished representative of this class of debaters entertained the committee yesterday afternoon. He made a strenuous effort to overthrow the competitive system by ridicule. This is a weapon suitable and effective in proper cases, but it is a hiltless sword and is quite likely to do more injury to the unskilled hand that wields it than to the adversary against whom it is drawn. It is often used by those to whom, on account of their limitations, a more suitable treatment is unattainable. It is, moreover, a kind of argument that enjoys the obvious advantage of requiring no great brain power to make it, which gives it wide availability. When most effective it suggests the destruction of infants and idiots. A lad with a knife in a picture gallery or a lunatic with a hammer in a hall of statuary could destroy more art in ten minutes than Raphael or Michael Angelo could produce in ten years.

There was another peculiarity about the argument of my honorable friend from the old Granite State, Mr. SULLOWAY. He found a political creed in the Scriptures and undertook to give credit to his assault upon the civil-service system by associating it with the name of St. Paul. It is not the first instance of political creeds being borrowed from the Bible. I well remember how Dennis Kearney tried to sanctify his warfare upon society with a text. When he was agitating the sandlotters he had a subordinate in his service by the name of Parson Wellock, who was slashing the monopolists whom he thought were oppressing the people of California. He founded his creed upon the command of the Lord to Moses, "Take all the heads of the people, and hang them up before the Lord," and he added, "As the Lord is a consuming fire, He must be obeyed."

It is not unlikely that those who have been committing abuses against the civil-service system by the indiscriminate removal of faithful employees found their creed in the Bible also, probably from the eighth verse of Psalm CIX, "Let his days be few; and let another take his office."

I know of another instance. Some time ago I was riding on a street car in this city when I encountered a man who belonged to what is known as the Anti-Civil Service League, and he informed me that they were coming up to the Capitol with rams' horns; that they had been round the Capitol six times; that they were going round the Jericho of civil service the seventh time, and then the city would tumble to pieces. Well, I always thought there was a ram in this controversy somewhere [laughter], for in all the ram-ifications of their debate there seems to be a great deal of fallacy and error, and when you get them into a corner where you can reach their rational faculties and appeal to them they are apt to look a little sheepish. I was struck with the appropriateness of the incident as an illustration of the moral quality of their warfare upon our competitive system, for Joshua was moving on a very low plane when he went with his army on that occasion, because he gave a command to his soldiers to put to the sword all the inhabitants of the country except Rahab the harlot and her family. [Laughter.] And so these people who are making war upon a beneficent system give the command, "Put all this system to the sword—man, woman, and child; spare only the painted courtesan of spoils." [Applause.]

MERIT SYSTEM AMERICAN AND DEMOCRATIC.

I now desire to say a few words about a real argument that is made here. I say "real" because a man may honestly make it, and that is that the competitive system as we have it in this country is un-American and undemocratic. I am glad to be honored with the attention of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] on this point. John Fiske, perhaps one of the greatest of our historians, says that the New England town is the completest democracy that the world has ever seen—the finest exhibition of that form of government which the sainted Lincoln described as "government of the people, for the people, and by the people." And he says that in that New England town all the officers were continued in office as long as they were efficient and would remain. Am I right?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. They were kept in office frequently forty or fifty years—just as long as they lived. And now in Brookline the chairman of the board of selectmen has occupied that position for twenty or twenty-five years.

Mr. BROSIUS. And Mr. Fiske further says that at that time the fathers never thought of conducting the business of the Government on any other principle than that on which the business of a private individual or corporation is conducted. And he adds that the expression "To the victors belong the spoils" was the most disgraceful remark that was ever recorded in American history.

Now, I think—and I know that most of you gentlemen will agree with me—that this Government was founded in part upon the principle that every man should have a chance to pass at his market value; that lineage or class or favor should not be permitted to elevate one man and bar the way to another; that in the spirit of the man is lodged that nobility whose credentials are not derived from the accident of inheritance or imposed by the hand of favor, but are what he is able to achieve by merit or earn by toil. Is not that democratic and American? I remember that James Russell Lowell gave the best definition of democracy that I ever read. "It is," said he, "a pathway for merit of whatever kind; it is that form of society in which every man has a chance and knows that he has it."

That is democracy. That is Americanism.

Have you forgotten the words of Archbishop Ireland in his address at the opening of the World's Fair in Chicago? He was speaking of democracy, and he used these words:

> What but that deep sense of personal dignity and personal worth that comes to so great an extent from democracy, that is the motive power of action in all lines of American progress, makes every citizen the arbiter of his destiny, and brings talent and industry in the reach of the highest prizes and highest honors, and within the reach of talent and industry, and makes individual worth the condition of success in all competition with one's fellow-men?

That is democracy. That is the true American sentiment.

Now, nothing conceivable could be more democratic than the competitive system, because it recognizes the only rational principle of equality, the only equality possible in this world—the equality of opportunity to become the highest and best we are capable of. It gives all a chance by not subjecting any to the mere choice, favor, or caprice of power. This is American and democratic.

To open the gates of the civil service of the country to the personal worth and merit of every American citizen is an American idea; to make public preferment the prize of merit, rather than of the spoil of political victory, is distinctly American; to make a position in the civil service a trophy to be contended for in honorable rivalry on the basis of qualifications, rather than a possession secured by favor, is in harmony with the highest and truest American sentiment.

Now, it is said that this system has been borrowed from the aristocratic institutions of the Old World. Why, it is distinctly repugnant to the exclusive spirit and class distinctions of an aristocracy. It belongs to a country of free schools and equality of privileges. Why, when they adopted that system there, it was a long step toward the American idea. You know how the lords and the bishops and the aristocratic landholders grimaced when they had to swallow that bitter pill and see their sons competing side by side with the sons of the common people for admission to the civil service of the country.

It was strictly an American idea that Great Britain borrowed when she adopted the competitive system, and she borrowed another idea about the same time, the idea of the free school; and, Mr. Chairman, the two systems go together. One is absolutely necessary to the support of the other. Neither belongs to the monarchic or aristocratic civilization of the Old World, but both were born of the new civilization of America and have been cherished and nourished by the free and equal institutions of the American Republic.

I am not, therefore, able to acquiesce in the suggestion that there is anything un-American or antidemocratic in the idea of our merit system.

SERIOUS REFLECTION UPON REPUBLICANS.

There are those who contend that the spoils of victory are necessary to effective party organization and the loyal allegiance and active work of the rank and file. In my judgment, the man who declares that offices secured by political influence and not by merit are necessary to secure the adhesion of Republicans to their party standards and devotion to the principles of the Republican party insults every Republican in the United States. [Applause.]

Why, I represent an average district. My constituents are perhaps as good Republicans as live within the limits of the Union. Not one out of twenty of them who are most active in the services of the Republican party, and most devoted to its principles, have a thought of a reward or a desire for office. That consideration is not in their minds. I speak now of course of the workers. They are men engaged in business, they could not afford to take an appointment if it was brought to them on a golden platter; they care nothing about it; except now and then an occasional one who is out of business, and who can suitably give his time and attention to the affairs of the Government. But the body of them who render services and give their devotion and time to the maintenance of the principles of the Republican party do so because they believe in those principles and regard them as best for the country. They are not Republicans for revenue. I have no doubt the same is true of the Republican party everywhere. [Applause.]

The thousands of young men whom the gentleman from Ohio says responded nobly to their party call and worked night and day to win success I know do not desire him to advertise them as men who responded for anticipated rewards in party spoils. Those noble young men would spurn such a bribe and hurl back the ungenerous imputation into the teeth of those who make it with the scorn and contempt it deserves. Those noble young men fully understand that not one in ten thousand can ever hope to secure place in the employment of the Government they uphold by their votes and the ardor of their devotion. They know the only chance for modest merit and independent manhood to secure preferment is by a method of selection in which qualification and fitness, and not the partiality of friendship or the favor and affection of men in positions of influence, determine the selection. They know that under the spoils system none dare even aspire to place except somebody's darlings.

No man not a partisan and friend of the Congressman or the Senator need ever look with longing eyes toward the Canaan of official hope, for the system bars him out. The partiality of the man who selects is the passport to place, and without that, though his merit is as shining as the sun, he is as one without hope.

I say, using my own district as an illustration, in which the Republican vote has grown from 52 per cent in 1856 to upward of 70 per centof the entire vote now, that the party has thus grown by annual accretions of the young men—young men of enterprise, of activity, of patriotism and aspiration—coming to the party and remaining with it, not held by the cohesive power of public office, but by a community of interest, sympathy, feeling, patriotism, and aspiration; and that is what has given the Republican party in this country its ascendency wherever it has enjoyed it.

I repel, with the scorn it deserves, the imputation upon the young Republicans of this country that they have their price for service in the ranks of the great Republican party of this country. In concluding this branch of the subject I read you the words of Senator Dawes, of Massachusetts, and I make them my own:

"When it is necessary to maintain that party, with all its glories behind it and all its hopes and promises before it, in power by the prostitution of the patronage of this Government to the purpose of controlling free thought with a free ballot in this country, it will cost more than it is worth. And though under the administration of a bill based upon the principle of this bill, that the public service is open to those in this country, without regard to their party affiliation, who can demonstate, under a rigid competitive examination, intelligently conducted and honestly adhered to, their fitness above others to a place, every political friend of mine in the country shall have to give place to those who entertain other principles, there will have been such an advance in the purity of administration in this Government, so much will have been accomplished, that no man will mourn who loves purity of administration and who desires the best interests of his country."

CRAZY LOGIC.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who is absent, but who is a very generous antagonist, has released me from the limitations which, under other circumstances, his absence would impose. I am at liberty to say anything in his absence that I would say in his presence. Therefore I desire to make some observations upon the speech he made the other day, as well as upon the speech he did not deliver, but published after the adjournment of the last session. Take this in his undelivered speech as an example:

Little did Washington ever dream that the hour would ever come in American history when the President would have been forced by law to yield the appointing power, given him by the terms of the Constitution, to a bureau independent of the President, and whose orders, if he shall violate them, will lay him liable to indictment and impeachment.

If that statement is the product of conscious cerebration it is difficult to understand the mind in which the operation was carried on.

Now, what do honorable members think of that proposition? As if the commission had any power to impose limitations upon the President of the United States! As if the President had not appointed them, and could not at any moment remove them! The commission is the agent of the President; it is the arm of the Executive, and can do nothing it is not bidden to do; and when an honorable member in cold blood writes down the assertion that the commission has power to interfere with the constitutional powers of the President of the United States, I will not say, but Thackeray would say, it is an indelicate exposure of the operation of his mind. I can not contemplate that kind of an argument with composure or consider it with patience.

AN INEXCUSABLE ERROR.

Now, I want to direct the attention of the House to another matter. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] took occasion in this address twice, actually and deliberately, to write down that the chairman of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service had introduced a bill providing for a civil pension for the employees of the Government of the United States. If he had said that in the heat of controversy, I could have excused it, but when he wrote it down with deliberation, with premeditation, with malice prepense, and sent it broadcast throughout this country, without knowing that it was true, it was a wrong to me. But he was not content with stating it once, he stated it twice. I disavow any such sentiment. I disclaim ever having entertained such a sentiment. I am distinctly opposed to such an idea. I believe that a civil-service pension is incompatible with American institutions and ideas and would not be suffered for a moment in this country, and when my honorable friend from Ohio makes a deliberate statement of that kind he violates one of the canons of controversy which forbids that one adversary shall impute to another opinions he does not entertain. When I think of this serious infraction of the truth, I would, if he were here, indulge in a little pleasantry.

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. BROSIUS. Well, I do not know but I will do it anyway, as long as he has given me license. A Quaker said to his friend, "I never use hard names, William, but if the mayor of this city should come to me and say, 'Josiah, I want thee to bring to me the biggest romancer in the city,' I would come to thee, and I would put my hand on thy shoulder and say, 'William, the mayor wants to see thee.'" [Laughter.]

Now, I would not apply that to my distinguished friend from Ohio, because I have no doubt the error was an inadvertence. It was a mistake, but it suggests a recklessness of statement which honorable gentlemen ought to guard themselves against. I was very much amused at the honorable member's assault upon Carl Schurz and George William Curtis. Mr. Curtis is in his grave and can not answer for himself. Carl Schurz can take care of himself, and I have no doubt that when he read the remarks of my friend from Ohio he simply disposed of it by the remark that Carlyle made when an anabaptist used some scurrilous language about Cromwell. Carlyle's remark was, "Well, another foul chimney has caught fire."

Now, as to George William Curtis. I note one distinction between Mr. Curtis and my honorable and highly esteemed friend from Ohio. When George William Curtis wanted to retire from the Republican party, when he was not in accord with the party principles, he simply retired. He did not claim to be a Republican or a Democrat when he was not in accord with their principles. He has never in his life, nor has Carl Schurz, so far as I know, ever denied his master and still claimed discipleship. I think that my friend from Ohio has justly laid himself under the imputation of denying his master in that he denies a part of the platform of the Republican party while he still claims discipleship.

Mr. BUTLER rose.

Mr. BROSIUS. I yield to my colleague with pleasure.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it a denial of our political "master" in Pennsylvania to be in favor of a modification of this law?

A MEMBER. Read the platform.

Mr. BUTLER. Let the gentleman who interjects that remark take care of the party in his own State. The gentleman now on the floor [Mr. BROSIUS] and myself come from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BROSIUS. And we hope to live there a long time.

Mr. BUTLER. We polled nearly 40,000 majority for McKinley in our two districts.

Mr. BROSIUS. Has the gentleman propounded his question?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROSIUS. The gentleman asks, Is it a denial of the master——

Mr. BUTLER. To advocate a modification of this law by legislation?

Mr. BROSIUS. Well, I do not think so; it depends on the modification.

Mr. BUTLER. Then modification would not necessarily be "a denial of the master."

Mr. BROSIUS. When a man says that he is opposed to the whole law—when he says that he would repeal the whole outfit—I say he denies his master, and if he still claims to be a Republican, he is claiming discipleship at the very moment he is denying his master.

Mr. QUIGG. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania know any Republican who proposes or wishes to repeal this law in its entirety?

Mr. BROSIUS. We have heard enough of them say so on this floor.

Mr. QUIGG. Only as an alternative proposition, I think.

Mr. MAHANY. Is it not a fact that a majority of the Republicans on this floor are in favor of a modification of the law; and has not the whole party read itself out of existence, according to the gentleman's theory?

Mr. BROSIUS. We are not advised how many are in favor of modification.

Mr. BUTLER rose.

Mr. BROSIUS. Is not the question of my colleague sufficiently answered?

Mr. BUTLER. I am not quite certain that it is.

Mr. BROSIUS. How can I improve the answer?

Mr. BUTLER. By allowing me to read the platform of the last Republican convention of the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BROSIUS. Oh, I can not do that.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not want to make any speech. Please allow me to read. I want my constituents to understand my position on this question.

Mr. BROSIUS. I am very glad to have you put yourself right with your constituents.

Mr. BUTLER. In that convention 14 delegates from my colleague's district and 14 from the one I represent voted unanimously for this resolution:

With an earnest desire to sustain the principles of the law and secure an honest, economical, and efficient administration of the affairs of the Government, we demand that the President of the United States by Executive order, and Congress by legislative enactment at the approaching session, shall establish a civil-service system that shall meet the approval of the better judgment and common sense of the American people.

Mr. BROSIUS. Is the gentleman through?

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir. I wish to know whether obedience to that injunction of our party in Pennsylvania would constitute a man a "spoilsman" and put him in conflict with his party organization.

Mr. BROSIUS. I will answer my friend.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not pretend to be a statesman. My colleague has been here longer than I have. He can doubtless instruct me.

Mr. BROSIUS. You will find the situation in a great many States about the same as it is in Pennsylvania. Will my friend have the goodness to state to me in precise terms what command that platform that he has read lays upon him?

Mr. BUTLER. It is the command of the Republican party of Pennsylvania—Republicans who never have to be persuaded to vote the Republican ticket.

Mr. BROSIUS. What does it command you to do?

Mr. BUTLER. To take part in some legislative enactment that will lead to a modification of this law. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that a Democrat might with propriety read from a State platform; but Republicans are in the habit of looking beyond State authority to national authority.

Mr. BROSIUS. I have studied that platform with zealous care, and all that I can derive from it is the command to do in this matter what I think the good of the country demands. There is in it no specific command in explicit terms. There is no statement of what kind of modifications are needed. The whole subject is left to my judgment to do as I think ought to be done; and that, God helping me, I propose to do.

Now, let me say a word about Pennsylvania.

PENNSYLVANIA AND THE CIVIL SERVICE.

In 1895 the Pennsylvania State Republican convention unanimously declared:

We earnestly insist upon a form of civil service which will prevent the enslavement of public officers and employees * * * and will insure the recognition of ability and fidelity in the public service, keeping service to the country ever foremost when accompanied by ability and fitness. We demand that public office should be for the public benefit, and its term in subordinate positions be during good behavior. No public employee or officer should be permitted to influence primaries or elections, nor upon any pretense to be taxed upon his salary, and all unnecessary positions and salaries should be abolished.

On that platform a State treasurer was elected by 175,000 majority. In pursuance of that declaration a committee of five distinguished Republicans was appointed to prepare suitable bills to carry out the purpose of the people. These bills were approved by the Republican State committee, by the State convention of the Republican party, and by the executive committee of the Civil-Service Reform Association of Pennsylvania.

The Republican State convention of Pennsylvania, in 1896, unanimously adopted the following declaration:

We reaffirm the declarations contained in the State platform of 1895 looking to needed reforms in State and municipal government and the purification of elections and the exercise of the elective franchise. We earnestly recommend to the next legislature the several reform bills promulgated by the Republican State committee and request the Republicans of both houses to give them favorable consideration and support, and such other bills as may be introduced at the next session of the legislature in line with the principles of reform.

On that platform and the national Republican platform of 1896 Pennsylvania polled the largest majority in her history—300,000 majority for William McKinley.

The civil-service bill thus ratified by the Republicans of Pennsylvania was modeled upon the Federal law, and contains all of its provisions and some besides, and it was passed by the senate of Pennsylvania in March last or later. These deliverances of the party in two consecutive years were honored by the approval of good citizens without distinction of party, and were approved by the press and the rank and file of the Republican party. The legislature was elected as a reform body on that reform platform. Some of them, senators and representatives, before their election gave distinct pledges that they would support the proposed civil-service legislation, including some of the members from my own district.

The Republican State convention of Pennsylvania of 1897 declared:

We adhere to and renew again the pledges of the Republican party to maintain a just, reasonable, and equitable system of civil service, but we denounce President Cleveland for his partisan abuses of its powers and his manipulation and unjust extension of its privileges beyond what was originally contemplated by the law or requried in the interest of good government so as to protect the unfit appointees of his own party from threatening nonpartisan competition. * * * With an earnest desire to sustain the principles of the law and secure an honest and economical administration of the affairs of the Government, we demand that the President of the United States by Executive order and Congress by legislative enactment at the approaching session shall establish a civil-service system that shall meet the approval of the better judgment and common sense of the American people.

We again declare ourselves in favor of the needed reforms in State and municipal governments, the purification of elections, and the free exercise of the elective franchise which we advocated in the State platforms of 1895 and 1896.

On that platform we elected a State treasurer by a reduced majority of 130,000. At that State convention the chairman of the Republican State central committee said, in explanation of the failure of the legislature to pass the bills which they had been pledged to pass, that, while the civil-service bill had passed the senate, it met with serious opposition in the house, and after being amended so as to seriously modify its provisions it failed of passage. He said that he had urged the members to support the measure because it was a pledge of the Republican party to do so, but the abuse of the law by the last administration had the effect of stirring up violent opposition. Because of the pledges in the platforms of 1895 and 1896 he adhered to the doctrine of civil service and the redemption of party pledges and earnestly sought the favor of the legislature for the measure. The result was the passage of two of the reform measures in substantial compliance with the pledges of the party, but the civil-service bill failed.

That is the history of the matter in Pennsylvania. Now, on the platform of 1896 and on the St. Louis platform my colleagues and I and the other Republicans of Pennsylvania went to the election, and we gave that civil-service platform and the national platform and Mr. McKinley, who stood upon it, 300,000 majority, the largest majority that was ever given to any Republican in that State.

Mr. MAHANY. Was it not on the money question that it was given?

Mr. BROSIUS. Oh, it was on half a dozen questions.

Mr. BRUMM. On the money and tariff questions, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. BROSIUS. It was on half a dozen questions. Now, in 1897, what did the Republican convention say?

Mr. PEARSON. One word——

Mr. BROSIUS. One word is too many just now, because I am wrestling with another gentleman. Now, I will read what the platform of 1897 says. My friend [Mr. BUTLER] has read a portion of it. I must reread it:

We adhere to and renew again the pledges of the Republican party to maintain a just, reasonable, and equitable system of civil service, but we denounce President Cleveland.

And so say we all.

Mr. PEARSON. I thought you were indorsing him.

Mr. BROSIUS. Not at all.

Mr. BUTLER. Why, he extended the system by those orders——

Mr. BROSIUS (reading)—

We adhere to and renew again the pledges of the Republican party to maintain a just, reasonable, and equitable system of civil service, but we denounce President Cleveland for his partisan abuse of its powers, and his manipulation and unjust extension of its provisions beyond that which was originally contemplated by the law or required in the interests of good government, so as to protect the unfit appointees of his own party from threatening nonpartisan competition.

Mr. PEARSON. That is exactly right.

Mr. BROSIUS. Why, certainly; and nobody has condemned his abuses more earnestly than I, and I unite with gentlemen who display a zeal that would do honor to the Apostle of the Gentiles in denouncing those abuses, which I have denounced ever since they were committed.

Mr. PEARSON. Let us bring in a bill that wipes those abuses off the statute books of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. BRUMM. No; let us wipe out the whole act.

Mr. BROSIUS (reading):

By his violation of the spirit and intent of the law the offices of the Federal Government have been filled with representatives of a single party; the standard of efficiency has been degraded; veterans of the late war have been dismissed to make places for political favorites without just or reasonable cause; promotions and transfers have been made for partisan reasons, regardless of merit, and in disregard of the spirit of the civil-service law.

Mr. BUTLER. Please read the next paragraph.

Mr. BROSIUS (reading)—

With an earnest desire to sustain the principles of the law and secure an honest and economical administration of the affairs of the Government, we demand that the President of the United States, by Executive order, and Congress, by legislative enactment at the approaching session, shall establish a civil-service system that shall meet the approval of the better judgment and common sense of the American people.

Mr. BUTLER. That is it.

Mr. BROSIUS. Now, as nearly as I can, I will carry out any explicit instructions given to me by the Republicans of Pennsylvania; that is within their right to instruct; but as long as they express their views in general terms and place no specific commands upon me, I am permitted to exercise my own judgment as to what is best for the civil service of this country. Of course on national issues I look for my instructions from the national rather than the State platform.

Mr. BUTLER. Will you please read the preamble to that platform, in which there seems to be an indication of what the modification of the law should be?

Mr. BROSIUS. Why, certainly; there is a vague expression of dissatisfaction with the administration of the law under President Cleveland, and that is shared by all the Republicans in the United States, as far as I know.

Mr. BRUMM. Will my friend allow me just one word, and I will promise not to interrupt him again?

Mr. BROSIUS. I hope my friend will agree and unite with me in making the way clear for the executive department of this Government to make such correction of these abuses as in the judgment of the President will promote the betterment of the civil service of our country.

Mr. BRUMM. If my friend will allow me one word, I will promise not to interrupt him again.

Mr. BROSIUS. The gentleman from the Eighth district is not through with his interrogation.

Mr. BUTLER. I am from the Sixth district, not the Eighth. That is where you were born, and you ought to know.

Mr. BROSIUS. Oh, no; that mistake has been made by a great many gentlemen. I was not born in that district. I had the happiness to be born in the district which I have the honor to represent.

Mr. BUTLER. Will you please read that part of the platform beginning "By his violation," etc., which would seem to indicate the different parts of the statute that we are expected to modify and the remedies we are supposed to bring about leading up to this declaration and beginning with the words "By his violation" I shall be glad to hand it to you.

Mr. BROSIUS. Oh, that is the same thing in substance as what has been read.

Mr. BRUMM. Will my friend allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. BROSIUS. I will.

Mr. BRUMM. Does my friend not think that if the merit system should be adopted, he can find sufficient merit in the Republican party during a Republican Administration, and limit it to it?

Mr. BROSIUS. I do most emphatically believe that.

Mr. BRUMM. Then why do you not advocate it?

Mr. BROSIUS. Not only that, but I can find in my own district Republicans enough who are competent to fill—I was going to say all the places in the gift of the Government, but we are not so numerous as that.

Mr. PEARSON. In the early part of your speech I understood you to say they would not take office if it were tendered on a golden platter.

Mr. BROSIUS. I said something of that kind; but I say we have enough of them who are competent to fill a great number of places. It is needless for any Republican to submit such a question as that to me. That does not reach the issue. The question is whether, in providing for the executive civil service, the true system is to take all of the servants from that party which for the time being is in the ascendency, thus changing them every four years, if there are such changes in the Administration, or whether we should adhere to a system which has been in vogue for fifteen years, the system of nonpartisan service, a system introduced in my district, so far as the selection of cadets at West Point and Annapolis is concerned, by Thaddeus Stevens more than thirty years ago, and has not since been departed from.

Mr. BRUMM. That is what you want—nonpartisan service, not meritorious service.

Mr. BROSIUS. Nonpartisan service is meritorious service. There is nothing left in it after you have gotten rid of the idea of filling all the places with the members of the party in power. There are but two contrasted forms of civil service in this country—one the old patronage system and the other the competitive, nonpartisan system. There is no middle ground. I certainly have not been so unfortunate as to be misunderstood as to my position. I believe in the nonpartisan, competitive, merit system in the civil service of the United States as far as it is suitable, as far as it can be applied with benefit to the Government, and no further; and I recognize a number of places that are not suitable for that system to be applied to, and those places I would not put in the classified service.

Mr. MAHANY. What are they?

Mr. QUIGG. Would you be in favor of a bill which sought to define more strictly and more accurately than the present law does just precisely what places should be in the competitive and classified service and what places should be exempted from competition?

Mr. BROSIUS. I would not, for the reason that I have repeatedly explained. I say that that is not wise legislation. The system of civil service, to be useful, must be flexible.

The idea of enacting a law that declared whether this position or that position should be in the classified service or out of it seems to me to be one that honorable members ought not to entertain. The civil service is executive. It is wholly administrative, and the executive department ought to have some leeway, some flexibility, so that if experience demonstrated that a certain office was improperly in, they could take it out, and if improperly out, they could put it in, and promote all the time the betterment of the service according to their judgment as to what the conditions of good administration require; and the executive department has full scope and liberty to do that, because the fundamental principle on which the whole system rests (and it is so stated in the law) is that everything that is done is subject to the conditions of good service. The Executive Departments themselves are in touch with the service and conversant with its needs.

Mr. QUIGG. Now I want to ask the gentleman this question: He says that he would not vote, if I understand him, for any modification of this law, but leave this matter in the hands of the Executive Departments.

Mr. BROSIUS. I did not say that. I said I would not vote for any modification which takes away from the executive department the privilege of determining what places are to be put in and what are to be taken out of the classified service.

Mr. QUIGG. Then I will ask the gentleman if that does not put him in rebellion against the platform of the Republican party of the State of Pennsylvania—that portion of the platform referring to President Cleveland?

> We adhere to and renew again the pledges of the Republican party to maintain a just, reasonable, and equitable system of civil service; but we denounce President Cleveland for his partisan abuse of its powers and his manipulation and unjust extension of its provisions beyond that which was originally contemplated by the law or required in the interests of good government, so as to protect the unfit appointees of his own party from threatening nonpartisan competition.
> By his violation of the spirit and intent of the law the offices of the Federal Government have been filled with representatives of a single party, the standard of efficiency has been degraded, veterans of the late war have been dismissed to make places for political favorites without just or reasonable cause, promotions and transfers have been made for partisan reasons, regardless of merit and in disregard of the spirit of the civil-service law.
> With an earnest desire to sustain the principles of the law and secure an honest, economical, and efficient administration of the affairs of the Government, we demand that the President of the United States, by Executive order, and Congress, by legislative enactment at the approaching session, shall establish a civil-service system that shall meet the approval of the better judgment and common sense of the American people.

Now, does not the gentleman think that he is in rebellion against that expression of the platform of his State convention?

Mr. BROSIUS. I can afford to be in rebellion against any law that has been repealed by a later law; and when you read to me the platform of 1892, or 1888, or 1884——

Mr. BUTLER. This is the platform of 1897, sir.

Mr. BROSIUS. We had no national platform in 1897.

Mr. QUIGG. I read from the platform of your own State.

Mr. BROSIUS. That was not my understanding.

Mr. QUIGG. If the gentleman says he can afford to be in rebellion against the platform of his own State, that is a matter for him——

Mr. BROSIUS. Of course I retract that statement when I discover that you are reading the State platform. I thought you were reading from the national platform, because it was in identical language, I think; and therefore I was going to say, as far as that was concerned, it had been repealed by the last national platform.

Mr. QUIGG. This is the platform of the Republican convention of the State of Pennsylvania, and I ask the gentleman if he is not in rebellion against that?

Mr. BROSIUS. I have stated over and over again that there is no command in the State platform directing me what to do.

Mr. QUIGG. It commends legislation to cure this specific thing.

Mr. BROSIUS. It does not explicitly state what modification shall be made, and it clearly implies that necessary modifications may be made by Congress or the Executive, and the latter is what I am contending for.

Mr. PEARSON. It says it must be in the line of common sense. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROSIUS. It leaves the whole subject open; it leaves the entire subject to my judgment; and I will so consider it as to carry out the purposes of the Republicans of Pennsylvania to secure the best, the soundest, and most efficient service that I am capable of.

Mr. BUTLER. I am satisfied that the gentleman will do that.

OCTOPUS.

Mr. BROSIUS. But this interlude about Pennsylvania politics has taken me far afield, and I must return to the subject. I had not quite concluded what I desire to say in reply to my distinguished friend from Ohio, Mr. GROSVENOR. In his undelivered speech he compared the Civil Service Commission to an octopus reaching out for things that were none of its business. If my friend had ever read Victor Hugo's description of an octopus in that wonderful book, The Toilers of the Sea, he would not have made this comparison. An octopus has great reaching capacity, but this commission has no arms. It can not reach. It can only take the food that is put into its mouth. He exclaims with great agitation, "Halt the outrages of the commission." That reminds me of Sergeant Buzfuz in the celebrated trial of Bardell vs. Pickwick.

When Buzfuz read the letter which contained the allusion to chops and tomato sauce, he exclaimed to the jury with great feeling:

> Great heavens! Chops and tomato sauce! Gentlemen of the jury, is the happiness of a sensitive and confiding female to be trifled with by such shallow artifices?

On that overwhelming suggestion he made a powerful appeal to the jury.

The Civil Service Commission resembles somewhat a police officer without pistol or club and with his hands tied. If you were to complain of him for not stopping burglars and arresting robbers, he might well reply: "I am deprived of all means of attack and defense. My hands are tied. I am appointed to look on and report to the mayor." That is precisely the situation of the Civil Service Commission as far as correcting abuses is concerned. They have the power to investigate and report, but there their power ends.

TAMMANY BATTLE CRIES.

My friend from Ohio rejoices in the statement of Judge Van Wyck, recently elected mayor of New York, that he would put none but Democrats in office, and refers to that declaration as a liberal political education for the young Republicans of America. Well, I will say that that is the kind of opinion for a man to hold who likes that kind of an opinion, but I can not commend it. It was, however, a Tammany battle cry, and Tammany is not stingy with her battle cries. She once had another, a mate to this, "To hell with reform," and the meaning of both was happily illustrated by the declaration of Judge Barnard when on trial for the corrupt use of judicial patronage; he said, "I won this office and its patronage is mine." That is the finest essence, the distilled spirit, the very soul of the spoilsman's creed.

FEALTY TO REPUBLICAN PRINCIPLES.

On another point, also, I must take issue with my distinguished friend from Ohio. He thinks fealty to Republican principles does not require him to sustain the civil-service plank of the Republican national platform; and here a spectacle is exhibited which it is not comforting to contemplate. We see a distinguished statesman, ripe in years and full of honors, a father in Israel, the pride of his State, at least in some respects; an honored Representative of a great Commonwealth, the State of Giddings, Waite, Hayes, Garfield, Sherman, McKinley—we behold this distinguished Representative, our gallant leader, a laggard in reform, behind Hayes, behind Garfield, behind Sherman, behind McKinley, behind Grant, behind Blaine, behind Harrison, behind every one of the great Republican statesmen for a quarter of a century, clinging to the exploded and worn-out methods of the past, resisting the progress of improvement in administrative methods, a lion in the path of wholesome reform, struggling to turn back the hands on the dial of human progress, apostatizing, turning his back upon the principles of his party, becoming a Peter denying his Master, advising his party to become a political Saturn by devouring its own children. Oh, what a spectacle to meet the honest gaze of Republicans who retain a loyal love for the great party, its matchless principles, and its splendid leaders!

That reform in the civil service is one of the tenets of Republican faith and has been for twenty-five years goes without saying. The first attack on the patronage system since the war was made by a Republican Representative on this floor. The first message favoring reform was written by and the first commission was appointed by a Republican President. A Republican President was the first to put the reform into operation as an administrative measure. The first civil-service law was passed by a Republican Congress and signed by a Republican President, and the first civil-service plank ever put in a national party platform was put in a Republican national platform a quarter of a century ago, and no Republican national platform has been without it from that day to this. In the last platform, so recent as 1896, is this plank:

The civil-service law was placed on the statute books by the Republican party, which has always sustained it, and we renew our repeated declarations that it shall be faithfully and honestly enforced and extended wherever practicable.

And the concluding paragraph of that platform declares:

Such are the principles and policies of the Republican party. By these principles we will abide, and these policies we will put into execution. We ask for them the considerate judgment of the American people.

That plank, with a pronounced civil-service man standing on it, was upheld by more than 7,000,000 Republican voters in the United States in the last election. Is not my friend from Ohio pledged to stand by that platform and to give force and effect to all its principles? Can he renounce that tenet of his party and still claim loyal devotion to Republican principles? Can he deny his master and still claim discipleship? Do party principles impose no obligation of fidelity? Is voting the party ticket a full discharge of our duty; and having done that, are we at liberty to repudiate its principles and dishonor its pledges?

What is a party? Webster defined a party as—

A number of persons united in opinion and aiming to influence or control the action of the community. Agreement in opinion is the essential thing in party. No lexicographer has yet defined a party to be a union of two hostile factions, each determined by the question which is paramount in the minds of the people.

Burke said:

Party is a body of men united for promoting by their joint endeavors the national interest upon some particular principle in which they are all agreed. For my part I find it impossible to conceive that any one believes in his own politics or thinks them to be of any weight who refuses to adopt the means of having them reduced into practice. It is the business of the speculative philosopher to mark the proper ends of government. It is the business of the politician who is the philosopher in action to find out proper means toward these ends and to employ them with effect.

And Burke adds by way of emphasis that—

If a member of a party does not concur in the general principles on which the party is founded and for which it stands, he ought to choose some other more conformable to his views.

It is a real felicity to know that when the gentleman from Ohio is at his best, enjoying entire immunity from that terrible spoils malady, he enjoys the companionship of Webster and Burke on this question. On the 23d of last February, in some observations on the bill to provide for the representation of the United States by commissioners at any international monetary conference hereafter to be called, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] said:

Mr. Speaker, important declarations in political platforms are never the result of accident, but are always the result of design. They are always born of conditions existing in the constituents of the party that gives the utterance. The Republican convention at St. Louis was a representative body of a great party in the country, and the men who went there and represented their several constituencies understood the conditions at home. They did not go to St. Louis to declare a platitude nor to make a mere declaration that was not demanded by existing conditions and that was not in consonance with the opinions of their constituents. The compromises of the St. Louis convention produced the result that we have before us, and I want to read a single paragraph from the proceedings of that convention, which will show what the understanding of the representatives there present was when this plank was brought in.

I will say, first, that that was a memorable occasion, one that no man who witnessed it will ever misunderstand. It was an occasion that will be a warning to a great many men in this country that they must obey party dictation and follow party standards, or cease to be members of that political party.

Mr. QUIGG. What does the gentleman mean by that?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I mean exactly what I say.

Mr. KNOX. Does the gentleman mean to read anybody out of the party?

Mr. QUIGG. I want to say that I will not accept the voice from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, the gentleman will follow his party. He is a good Republican. He is just out on a mistaken notion.

Our friend is only out on a mistaken notion now. He will right himself when this little storm is over and the sun reappears. But more recently, in another lucid interval, the gentleman from Ohio delivered himself of an observation altogether worthy of the best Republicanism. In his address to the Ohio Republican State convention, June 23, 1897, when he took the chair as temporary president, he put in fine array the glorious principles of the St. Louis platform, and emphasized their binding obligation upon the Republicans of the United States. These were his words:

We pledged ourselves to favor legislation that would reopen the possibility of reciprocity of trade with foreign nations. We declared that we were "unalterably opposed to every measure calculated to debase our currency or impair the credit of the country," and we pledged ourselves to secure, if possible, an international agreement upon this vexed question of coinage.

AN AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY.

We promised fair treatment to the Union soldier, and pledged ourselves to an American policy in dealing with foreign countries, to reassert the Monroe doctrine, and to the use of the influence of the United States and its good offices to restore peace and give independence to Cuba. We promised to upbuild the Navy, to protect our country from the incursion of foreign immigration deleterious in character, and we said that we would honestly enforce the civil-service law, and there were other suggestions. This is the charter of the Republican party. It stands unrepealed, and no keynote is necessary to enforce its binding obligation upon the Republicans of the United States.

And the platform of principles adopted by that convention with great unanimity declared as follows:

The Republicans of Ohio rejoice in the magnificent victory of last year, whereby the people of the United States overwhelmingly decided in favor of an honest dollar and a chance to earn it, and elected as President that splendid son of Ohio, William McKinley.

The platform upon which that victory was won declares the true principles and policy of the Republican party. To all the declarations of that platform we pledge anew our allegiance and unqualifiedly commend the President and Congress for their wise and statesmanlike execution of its pledges.

More recently than that, within a few days, my honorable friend from Ohio has shown the temper of his mind toward traitors to the Republican party and given us his idea of what constitutes a betrayal of the party. There was published in a Washington paper the other day a letter to one of his constituents, which is pregnant with suggestion on this subject. I reproduce the letter, assuming it to have been written as stated:

DEAR SIR: I will not undertake any employment, professional or otherwise, that will bring me in any way in contact with, or into the presence of, the person who is now exercising the office of governor of Ohio.

C. H. GROSVENOR.

Now, with these repeated utterances called to his recollection, I ask the gentleman from Ohio whether the civil-service plank in our national platform is binding upon the Republicans of the United States? He can answer at his leisure, but however he answers he will find himself convicted out of his own mouth. His dilemma reminds me of a few lines of rustic rhyme written to hit off a similar situation into which a champion of slavery fell on one occasion in a debate with one of the sharp-witted logic choppers in the anti-slavery ranks. The poet put in the mouth of the discomfited champion of slavery these words, which I do not reproduce to give offense, but merely as a pleasantry:

Pray, Lindley, don't vex one
By asking a question
Which answered upsets his own side;
It's very perplexing,
Exceedingly vexing,
For one's self to show he has lied.

There is a fine passage in Macaulay's famous Essay on Bacon which brings graphically into view the contrast between Lord Bacon when pursuing noble and lofty aims and when moved by the low and sordid object of personal aggrandizement. Macaulay says:

The difference between a soaring angel and a creeping snake is but the type of the difference between Bacon the philosopher and Bacon the attorney-general, Bacon seeking for truth and Bacon seeking for the seals.

The contrasted attitudes of the gentleman from Ohio toward the question of Republican allegiance to the principles of the party, as declared in its latest platform, bring into view the difference between the honorable member seeking to hold the party in love and unity, in upholding its declared principles, and the honorable member seeking the spoils of office for his friends.

PLEASANTRIES AND PROPHECIES.

I am sure my distinguished friend from Ohio will not mind these pleasantries, for he is himself addicted to amusement of that character. On April 22, 1891, he declared in a speech on the subject of civil service:

I will vote not only to strike out this appropriation but I will vote to repeal the whole law.

But in his testimony before the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service of the Fifty-first Congress he said that he had never said he was in favor of the repeal of the law, and that he was not in favor of its repeal, and he insisted that there was no inconsistency between those two statements.

In a speech in the House, in answer to a question of Mr. Clements, of Georgia, as to what the civil service was he favored, he responded:

To turn the Democratic party out of power and to put the Republican party in.

In explanation of that my honorable friend said that he was discussing the subject of the Chicago platform, which declared in favor of the civil-service law, and that it was only a matter of pleasantry which he thought every man who was not too serious in the business would perfectly well understand. This explanation affords great solace to me, for it relieves me of much difficulty in respect to many of his statements in the course of this age-long debate on civil service.

Then I have no doubt his unfulfilled prophecies would find a similar explanation. In a hearing before the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service of the Fifty-first Congress, he said that he had not introduced a resolution to repeal the civil-service law in an Ohio State Republican convention for two reasons: "First," said he, "I don't want to disturb the peace; and second, I don't want to repeal the civil-service law and I never said so; and as I said before and as I say now, any political party that hopes twice to be elected in this country, or if the man who is a candidate for the Presidency in 1892 announces his advocacy of this system and manner of carrying out the civil-service law, he will be beaten 100 electoral votes."

It is gratifying to know that at that time, if not now, the Republicans of Ohio were so thoroughly wedded to the civil-service law that the introduction of a resolution to repeal the law would have produced a breach of the peace. It is gratifying also to know that the prophecy of my learned friend was not fulfilled, for in 1892 Grover Cleveland was elected President of the United States upon a platform containing a distinct pledge of adherence to the civil-service law and in 1896 William McKinley, of Ohio, was elected to the Presidency of the United States upon a platform which contained an equally distinct pledge of adhesion to that law. But an easy explanation of all these things is at hand now. They were the pleasantries of my honorable friend from Ohio.

CONSISTENCY.

The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARKE] and some other members who entertain identical views with him think that a practical civil service is desirable, but hold that the advocates of the merit system are not consistent. He suggests that consistency is a jewel that is not found in the silken casket of the mugwump, whatever that may mean, but when I hear them condemning the wickedness of the Civil Service Commission and its abuses in the matter of examinations and certifications, and at the same time advocating the perpetuation of that wicked system as to that part of the service which they admit ought to remain in the classified service, I can not well avoid the reflection that reason and logic, attributes which distinguish the best devoloped men, are not always found in the opalescent capital that surmounts the anatomical column of the advocates of a legislative repeal or modification of the civil-service law.

My honored friend from New Hampshire wants a change, but he says he does not know what the law ought to be, but it ought to be something different from what it is, and he told a parrot story to illustrate his argument. He seemed to be in the position of the Frenchman who did not know what he wanted, nor why he wanted it, but he wanted it right away.

THE BENT GUN.

The address of my honorable colleague on the committee [Mr. LANDIS] was a notable production and made a deep impression upon his auditors. It was rhetorical and forceful. It was the strongest arraignment of the spoils system heard in the debate. His eloquent recital of the abuses committed in the Public Printing department prior to its coming into the classified service must have convinced many of the desirability of keeping that branch of the service under the competitive system. I congratulate my friend on the success of his speech, though it was in a direction opposite that intended, and reminded me of the bent gun which a boy fired round a haystack. The shot circled the stack and lodged in the body of the unfortunate gunner. Or, in other words, it was the gun

That, aimed at duck and plover,
Bore wide and kicked its owner over.

UNFAIR.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], who is usually candid and dispassionate as he is strong and convincing, did not do himself justice in his discussion of this subject. There is room for the suspicion that he was seeking the trophies of conquest rather than those of truth. I will give one illustration. He presented a picture of the Civil Service Commissioners, none of whom are lawyers, examining an applicant for assistant attorney of the Interior Department. My friend should have known that the Civil Service Commissioners personally examine no one. They are the heads of the commission, and regulate and coordinate the agencies and instrumentalities employed in the conduct of the work. The questions used in examinations are prepared and the examination papers are examined in every case requiring professional or expert knowledge by the ablest men in their respective lines in the service of the Government. In fact, the heads of Departments to a large extent direct the character of the examinations with reference to the needs of the particular service. In many instances the Departments require a higher grade of tests than the commission think necessary. So that everything relating to the examinations has in view the most suitable tests for the kind of work required, and my friend's dramatic picture by which he sought to ridicule the system was only an airy fiction of his imagination.

TAMMANY TIGER.

It was an agreeable interlude in the weariness of debate when my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] rallied to the defense of Tammany. He referred to Senator Conkling's bitter taunt, "The dreary drivel of the snivel-service reformer," but he omitted to allude to Professor Huxley's observation on Conkling's defense of the spoils system. Some years ago, at a dinner in New York, Professor Huxley asked Senator Conkling what he thought of the civil-service reform. The Senator launched into an eloquent defense of the spoils system. Huxley was asked what he thought of it. He replied that it was the most eloquent defense he had ever heard of a perfectly indefensible thing. But the gentleman's defense of Tammany was refreshing. It stirred the stagnant air, filled the atmosphere with ozone, and quickened the circulation of every member of the committee. We saw beauty in the blast and grandeur in the gale of his spirited and eloquent defense. No criticism can be made upon that performance. It was complete in every particular; but it did remind me of the lines in a favorite opera which was much in vogue a few years ago:

There is beauty in the bellow of the blast,
There is grandeur in the growling of the gale,
There is eloquence outpouring when the lion is a roaring
And the [Tammany] tiger is a lashing of his tail.

FLAPDOODLE.

We have heard it said in debate, "Repeal the law and give every man and woman in the land an equal right with every other man and woman to hold office." Such an observation is a grave reflection upon the intelligence of those to whom it is addressed. I can not dignify such argument by any nobler title than "flapdoodle," which somewhere in our literature is defined as "food for fools." Why, every man whose intellectual eyes are open knows that that equality of right is precisely what the competitive system secures to every man and woman in the land, while the patronage system denies it to all except a selected class who stand in the sunshine of somebody's favor, the friends of those in power; somebody's darling or somebody's servile slave or obsequious sycophant.

No independent man with courage enough to have an opinion different from that held by the dispenser of places would have any more chance to get an office than a camel has to get through the eye of a needle. When a member of Congress selects the recipients of official favor, he excludes first all but members of his own party; then all of his own party who do not belong to his faction; then all of his own faction except the few whom he most favors for personal, social, or political reasons. This is the mode of sifting which results in the exclusion of the American people from the public service on the ground of considerations and principles which have no relation to the good of the service. So when you put forward this pretense of a claim, "an equal chance for all," you mean all your friends, all who helped to elect you, all who are agreeable to you and execute your wishes. These may all be candidates for your favor, and the few who occupy the sunniest places in the great mansion of your capacious affection will win, and all beside are barred from the benefits of the public service.

So that, alluring as the proposition is, it has no corresponding reality. Patriotic enough in sound, but entirely impracticable in practice. George Eliot somewhere says:

Some arrangements have a patriotic sound, but looked at more closely they seem like arrangements among certain wolves to drive away all other wolves and then see which among themselves can snatch the largest share of the prey.

Under the old patronage system certain politicians or statesmen, namely, those of the particular party in power, agreed among themselves to drive away all other politicians and statesmen and then they compete among themselves for the largest possible share of the prey, and the rivalry, instead of being on the basis of merit among the applicants for places, is altogether between the politicians and statesmen as to the extent of their pull with appointing officers.

COMPETITIVE EXAMINATIONS.

On the other hand, if you take your recommendation from a fair and impartial examination you are certain to secure better results. John Fisk, the greatest American historian now living, says in his book on Civil Government in the United States:

Where there are so many servants to appoint, the appointing officer can not know much about the qualifications or character of applicants and must act from advice from some one, and the advice of an examining board is sure to be much better than the advice of politicians or members of Congress who look out for their friends.

I have been struck with the force of Lord Macaulay's observations on this subject in his speech in Parliament on the civil service in India. He insisted that the Government was entitled to the best talents England could spare.

There is no excuse—

He said—

for employing an average man when you can obtain a superior man, and the way to find superior men is by an examination.

When it was suggested that an academic examination was not an unfailing test, he admitted it, but insisted that they were nevertheless tests, and he demonstrated it by illustrations from every walk of life—in Parliament, at the bar, the bench, and the church—and showed how much more likely to succeed in every position were those whose educations were liberal. Then he contended that the objection proved too much even for those who use it. It would prove there was no use in education and general intelligence.

Education, he said, would be a mere useless torture if at two and twenty a man who had neglected his education was on a par with the man who acquired an education and as likely to perform all the offices of public life with credit to himself and advantage to the Government. You are sure to secure, to start with, a suitable degree of general intelligence, with the chances in favor of the practical qualifications required. Of course it would not hold out in every instance. Nothing does. The president of a university in Amsterdam demonstrated that a man could succeed in high educational walks without Greek. He said:

You see me. I never learned Greek and I never found I missed it. I have had a doctor's cap and gown without Greek; I have 10,000 a year without Greek; I eat heartily without Greek; in short, I don't know Greek, and I do not believe there is anything in it.

Still our college lads study Greek with great profit, and it is not likely to be dropped from the college curriculums in this country.

No one will question the propriety of examinations for promotion in the Army, and yet I recall an instance in which an examination afforded no security whatever for fitness. During the war there was a vacancy in the office of colonel to be filled. An Irish captain was examined for the place. He was asked a number of scholastic and technical questions, all of which he failed to answer. Then, as a mere joke, they asked him this question:

Supposing you were in command of a regiment of infantry and you were attacked by a detachment of cavalry, what would you do?

He replied:

I would form a hollow square and knock hell out of every mother's son of them.

The result of the examination was submitted to the President, who, after examining the papers, ordered the Irish captain to be promoted. He made a brilliant military career during the war. I never heard that on that account they ceased holding examinations for promotion in the Army. Instances prove nothing. It is the totality of effect in every matter of importance which is the criterion. There is, however, a strong presumption in favor of the fitness of those who show the greatest general intelligence. In any event this can only be definitely determined by a practical test, and this is provided by the probation period under the rules. Moreover, the competitive system enjoys a distinct advantage in case the final test discloses a lack of qualifications, for the situation is relieved of restraint or embarrassment. Not having been appointed by political influence, the applicants will not seek political influence to retain them in the service when their unfitness is demonstrated, and they will be dismissed promptly for the good of the service.

ABUSES.

In the same category is the argument based on alleged abuses in administration. Assuming the existence of some abuses and an occasional instance of maladministration which worked injustice to individuals, they insist that the whole system should be uprooted that justice may be done. They do not stop to reflect that inconveniences and abuses are incident to all human institutions. The most strenuous exertions of man are not equal to the task of devising rules for the regulation of affairs that will work with entire satisfaction. Experience teaches us that it is better to tolerate some abuses lest in trying to correct them we make them worse. Because we have not arrived at perfection in the administration of our civil-service law and the rules under it is a very unreasonable reason for abolishing the system.

On such a principle no human institution would survive an hour. Because some noxious poppies grow shall all wholesome plants be exterminated? Shall we cease dispensing justice because in some instances it is dispensed with by our courts? Shall we abolish the great transportation companies because they sometimes discriminate in violation of law and right? Shall we abolish the Christian church because the wicked still flourish? Shall we decry wisdom because fools still abound? Shall education be abandoned because there are still men to make indelic te exposures of their intelligence by the kind of arguments we hear against the competitive system in our civil service? Because some people have made hogs of themselves in the administration of the civil-service system shall we all be denied wholesome bacon? Such a mode of reasoning ought to be filtered through a bed of intellectual charcoal before it is fit for the contemplation of an honest mind.

EXECUTIVE CONTROL.

Every feature of our civil-service system on which criticisms, sometimes wise and sometimes quite otherwise, have been made is an administrative feature. Excepting a few general directions and mandatory provisions as a groundwork for the system, it is all administrative and absolutely under Executive control. All the means for its extension are brought into operation by Executive agency. All modifications are made by Executive order through rules promulgated for the purpose. Those who projected the system were wise in constructing a house to be furnished by those who were to live in it.

The nature of the subject did not admit of different treatment. An administrative system for our civil service can not be built like a railroad or constructed like a watch. It must grow like a plant or a tree that can be pruned and trimmed to the taste of the gardener. It was made flexible that it might be useful. It was intended to grow in extent as it advanced in the respect and confidence of the people. When it grows too fast, the Executive pruning knife lops its branches. If it needs a more luxuriant growth, cultivation brings it out. If it is desirable to extend it to other portions of the garden, the Executive gardener sets out cuttings. In short, it is altogether under the control of those charged with the administration of the executive civil service. It can not be doubted that if the system is a suitable one to any extent, that is the best situation for it to be in, and I hope we may all see the wisdom of allowing it to remain in that situation.

I am reluctant to believe that either ignorance or prejudice would carry anyone to the length of denying the present Administration the right to maintain the existing system if it is convinced that the good of the service requires it, or to deny it the right to so modify existing rules as to correct errors into which the preceding Administration fell in making extensions of the system. No member of this House could justify his presence in this legislative body if he opposed what is necessary to an efficient and economical administration of our civil service, and he pays a doubtful compliment to the Executive Departments of the Government when he submits a proposal to deny them the right to judge for themselves of the requirements of the best service in their several Departments.

The President has given us his word that he will guard the civil service and make such modifications as he thinks the good of the service requires. These are the words of his message:

CIVIL-SERVICE LAW.

The important branch of our Government known as the civil service, the practical improvement of which has long been a subject of earnest discussion, has of late years received increased legislative and Executive approval. During the past few months the service has been placed upon a still firmer basis of business methods and personal merit. While the right of our veteran soldiers to reinstatement in deserving cases has been asserted, dismissals for merely political reasons have been carefully guarded against, the examinations for admittance to the service enlarged and at the same time rendered less technical and more practical; and a distinct advance has been made by giving a hearing before dismissal upon all cases where incompetency is charged or demand made for the removal of officials in any of the Departments.

This order has been made to give to the accused his right to be heard, but without in any way impairing the power of removal, which should always be exercised in cases of inefficiency and incompetency, and which is one of the vital safeguards of the civil-service reform system, preventing stagnation and deadwood and keeping every employee keenly alive to the fact that the security of his tenure depends not on favor, but on his own tested and carefully watched record of service.

Much of course still remains to be accomplished before the system can be made reasonably perfect for our needs. There are places now in the classified service which ought to be exempted, and others not classified may properly be included. I shall not hesitate to exempt cases which I think have been improperly included in the classified service or include those which in my judgment will best promote the public service. The system has the approval of the people, and it will be my endeavor to uphold and extend it.

Can we not trust the President? He has sent us no message requesting our intervention for the improvement of the civil service. He is not asking that his power be curtailed or that his hands be tied lest he may do violence to the public service. He is content to enjoy the liberty of deciding what will promote the success of his Administration and advance efficiency and economy in the civil service within the limits of discretion, which the existing law gives him. I would not like to be beforehand in putting such restrictions upon him. We know he does not desire this legislation. We know it is against his judgment. I have implicit confidence in his ability, his integrity, and his honor. I can trust him with the administration of our civil-service system, with the authority which the law gives him to direct and control it with a view to its highest efficiency.

No head of a Department has petitioned this body for the proposed legislation. Nor need they do so even if they desired it, for the end is attainable without legislation if it is desirable. This legislation not only produces results that may be desired, but it imposes results not desired by those charged with the administration and who are most competent to judge what is required.

No inquiry has been made or investigation had as to the wisdom of removing a large number of places from the classified service or as to the effect it will have upon the efficiency and economy of that branch of the civil service. It is a leap in the dark without even the justification of revealed defects in the present arrangement to the detriment of the service. It is prompted by considerations wholly outside the service and for the attainment of ends unconnected with the good of the service.

THE FATHERS ON CIVIL SERVICE.

Some sporadic attempts have been made to show that the fathers of the Republic were believers in the patronage system. Such an attempt is an insult to the memory of the great men who "laid our keel and wrought our ribs of steel," who modeled our institutions and set a wholesome pace in their administration before the "devil of spoils" entered the garden of our civil service to corrupt and pervert.

During the Administration of the first six Presidents those who were charged with the duty of making appointments in the civil service performed their duty with a conscientious regard for the public interests, regarding the appointing power as a public trust to be exercised with a scrupulous care for the public welfare. Political opinions or religious affiliations or private motives were not considered in Executive appointments. The elevation of mind and lofty patriotism which characterized the statesmen of that period finds striking illustration in their public utterances on the subject of political patronage.

In a letter to a friend, President Washington said:

My friend —— I receive with cordial welcome to my house and welcome to my heart; but with all his good qualities he is not a man of business. His opponent, with all his politics so hostile to me, is a man of business. My private feelings have nothing to do with the case. As George Washington, I would do this man any kindness in my power. As President of the United States, I can do nothing.

Mr. Blaine, in his Twenty Years in Congress, says:

When the Federal Government was originally organized, the President and Vice-President, Senators and Representatives were specifically limited in their tenure of service. The Federal judges were appointed for life. All other officers were appointed without any limit as to time, but according to the decision of Congress were removable at pleasure by the Executive. For twelve years there were practically no removals. There was some party spirit developed in the contest in 1800.

Jefferson's views were well known to be as conservative as those of his predecessors, but he was beset for place in an extraordinary manner by eager applicants who claimed to have contributed to his triumph over John Adams and demanded their reward. Jefferson yielded to their solicitation, and began to make removals on the plea that it was not fair that all the offices should be held by Federalists. There was a great outcry against this course by conservative men who were averse to the removal of competent men and faithful public servants. Jefferson only intended to remove enough to give his own supporters a fair proportion of places. In a short time the office-holders who had not been politicians came to the conclusion that they could effect the equalization more readily by declaring their allegiance to Jefferson's party. Between the clamor of those opposed to removals and the ready transfer of political allegiance on the part of those in the service, Jefferson was convinced of the error and abandoned the policy of removal after he had displaced forty-seven officers, and thereafter removals were only for cause until 1829.

Jefferson's own statement of the situation to which Mr. Blaine refers is as follows:

Of the thousands of officers, therefore, in the United States a very few individuals only, probably not twenty, will be removed, and those only for doing what they ought not to have done. I know that in stopping thus short in the career of removal I will give great offense to many of my friends. That torrent has been pressing me heavily and will require all my force to bear up against, but my maxim is fiat justitia, ruat cælum.

In 1801, in closing a letter on the subject of appointments, he said:

The only question concerning a candidate shall be, Is he honest, is he capable, is he faithful to the Constitution?

Madison, Monroe, and John Quincy Adams shared with their predecessors these elevated views of public duty with respect to the civil service. All removals from office in those six Administrations were for cause. Washington made 9 removals, John Adams 9, Jefferson 39, Madison 5, Monroe 9, John Quincy Adams 2. These were offices of higher grade which were filled by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate But the number of removals in the inferior grades were correspondingly small, and in all cases for cause. Political influence and personal favor or disfavor are not believed to have had an agency in a single removal or in the selections to fill vacancies.

The passage of the tenure of office act in 1820 called forth many expressions of disapproval from the leading statesmen of the day. Mr. Calhoun said:

The act is one of the most dangerous ever passed and it will work a revolution.

Jefferson said:

The late mischievous law, vacating every four years nearly all the executive offices of the Government, saps the Constitution and salutary functions of the President and introduces a system of intrigue and corruption which will soon leaven the mass not only of Senators but of citizens.

Clay, speaking of the same law, said:

The tendency has been to revive the Dark Ages of feudalism and to render an office a feudatory.

Mr. Webster said of it:

I am for staying the further contagion of this plague. Men in office have begun to think themselves mere agents and servants of the appointing power.

Later on, describing the condition of the civil service under the Jacksonian spoils régime, Mr. Webster said:

As far as I know, there is no civilized country on the earth in which, on a change of rulers, there is such an inquisition for spoils as we have witnessed in this free Republic. * * * The same party selfishness which drives good men out of office will push bad men in. Political proscription leads necessarily to the filling of offices with incompetent persons, and to a consequent malexecution of official duties.

Still later he said:

It may well alarm the lovers of free institutions when all the offices in these several Departments are spoken of in high places as being "spoils of victory," to be enjoyed by those who are successful in contest, in which they profess this grasping of the spoils to have been the object of their efforts.

Albert Gallatin said:

So far as respects subordinate offices, talent and integrity are to be the only qualifications.

Thomas H. Benton said:

The very men who advocate the spoils system for public business would call a man a fool if he proposed the same system for private business.

LATER VIEWS.

In later days equally pronounced views have been expressed by representative men. Representative John J. Kleiner, in 1886, said:

The greatest reform we could bring about would be to free Senators and Representatives of all responsibility as to the distribution of offices.

John Sherman, in his memoirs, advocates an imperative provision of law forbidding any member of Congress applying for the appointment of any person to an executive office. He says:

Such a mandatory provision would not only break up the spoils system, but would relieve the President and heads of Departments, as well as members of Congress, from much friction that often disturbs them in the discharge of their separate duties

Later he said:

There is the power to select by favoritism, and that power ought to be checked and guarded.

I therefore will vote for any law which will enable any man, rich or poor, whatever may be his condition, wherever he may live, to go at the proper time before proper officers and be examined. In other words, the English rule, which has been adopted there only within a few years, has worked wonderfully well, so that any person there can go before the proper officers and be examined, and he may be appointed if he proves himself to be more meritorious than anyone else. I am in favor of any law that will accomplish that.

Mr. Blaine said:

The settled judgment of discreet men in both political parties is adverse to the custom of changing nonpolitical offices on merely political grounds. They believe it impairs the efficiency of the service, lowers the standard of political contests, and brings reproach upon the Government and the people. So decided is this opinion among the great majority of Republicans and among a very considerable number of Democrats that the former methods of appointment will always meet with protest, and can not be permanently reestablished. (See Blaine in 1873, 1, 43, 681.)

As early as 1870 Garfield said in Congress:

We press appointments upon the Departments, we crowd the doors. * * * Senators and Representatives throng the offices and bureaus until the public business is obstructed. * * * And men are appointed, not because they are fit for their positions, but because we ask it. * * * This, Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, is the true field for retrenchment and reform. In this direction is the true line of statesmanship.

Some years later, in an article published in the Atlantic Monthly, Mr. Garfield said:

One-third of the working hours of members is hardly sufficient to meet the demands upon them in reference to appointment. The present system impairs the efficiency of the legislators; it degrades the civil service; it repels from the service those high and manly qualities which are so essential to a pure and efficient administration, and finally it debauches the public mind by holding up public office as the reward of mere party zeal.

In the same article this statement is found:

It is sometimes urged against civil-service reform that the head of each Department and bureau ought to have the selection of his own subordinates; but under the patronage system he has no such selection at all. The men selected are chosen not on account of a knowledge of their fitness possessed by the appointing officer, but because they are recommended by a certain Representative or Senator. The head of the Department or bureau feels little responsibility for their acts. It often happens that he is not at liberty to discharge an inefficient man lest he may offend the Congressman whose influence secured the appointment of that man. The Congressman, on the other hand, does not feel the responsibility for these appointments, for he is not nominally nor legally the appointing officer. In many cases it is not known on whose recommendation the appointment is made. This system "invades the independence of the Executive and makes him less responsible for the character of his appointments. It impairs the efficiency of the legislator by diverting him from his proper sphere of duties and involving him in the intrigues of the aspirants for office."

Abraham Lincoln said:

I am opposed to removals to make places for our friends.

[Congressional Record, House, page 3803, April 24, 1890.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I want to indorse every word that my honored colleague [Mr. McKinley] has said in this behalf. The civil-service system which is assailed is not of recent origin. It is the result of a healthy evolution. It has come to stay and grow.

Mr. BIGGS. It will not stay long.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Yes, it will stay. Let us see what is proposed by this amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee. Let me state the proposition. It is, not to repeal the law—not even to stop the salaries of the commissioners. You can not do that in this way. It is not to stop appointments; it is in effect in some measure to stop the administration of the several Departments of this Government, because you can not make a single appointment except from the "eligible" list furnished by this commission. If, then, this motion should prevail, what does it do? It does not repeal the law; it does not even mangle it; it does not stop the salary of the commissioners, but it does prevent them from executing a duty which the law you helped to enact devolved upon them.

Sir, the campaign of 1882 was won by the Democracy because it was charged, and it was believed, that we were filling the offices, not with free and intelligent men, but with mere political retainers. "Monarchical!" There is nothing that smacks of monarchical forms so much as the spoils system, under which a man stands here, not the representative of the people, but the especial representative of retainers who go at his beck and nod, political "bummers," who become stronger than the free intelligent citizens who stand by his side. In other words, we expect to return to our places, not upheld by the virtue and intelligence of the constituents we represent, but by gathering together retainers and packing the conventions, with all that implies.

Senator Dawes said:

* * * * * * * *

Institute an open competitive examination. Let it, by some machinery which shall be determined the best, be carried out as perfectly as you can, and then he who enters upon the public service will not depend for his place either on the political bias or the desire of him who appoints him, but on his personal knowledge and acquaintance with the details of the office that he fills and of the qualities of him who is to enter it. Secure this, and you will have reached to a considerable extent this demand as well as the other; but it is the omnipotent public opinion, created by what we have seen within the last few months, that demands at our hands that we shall respond by such legislation as shall forever make the repetition of the evil impossible.

Horace Porter, now minister to France, in his great oration on Grant on the occasion of the dedication of the Riverside Park mausoleum, recited as one of the glories of that distinguished American his devotion to civil-service reform. These were his words:

For the first time in our history he brought about a genuine reform in our civil service, and in the face of the most persistent opposition organized the first civil-service board.

EQUALITY OF PARTIES IN THE SERVICE.

Much earnest comment has been made upon the last order of Mr. Cleveland, covering in a large number of places. The truth about that makes it bad enough and exaggeration is uncalled for. Many irresponsible statements have been made in newspapers and other publications that forty or fifty thousand Republicans were turned out and their places filled with Democrats and then the blanket order spread over them for their protection. Nothing could be further from the truth than this. The celebrated order of May 6, 1896, covered 31,372 places. Of this number, 5,063 were in the navy-yards and had been placed under a civil-service régime by Secretary Tracy in the Harrison Administration. As many as 12,000, or nearly so, were nonpolitical places in branches of the service in which politics had been little known for years, so that from fifteen to twenty thousand places included in the order were nonpolitical at the time the order was issued. In the remaining places covered by the order there were, of course, many Republicans, but the number I am unable to ascertain.

To show the growth of the classified service and the agency had in it by the successive Administrations since the act of 1883 was passed, I will here append a statement, which shows that after deducting the nonpolitical places embraced in the order of May 6, 1896, and deducting from the calculation entirely the Railway Mail Service, which we may fairly assume had in it about an equal number of both parties after the Harrison Administration reissued the Cleveland order that had been suspended, it appears that the Republican and Democratic Administrations, covering a period from 1883 to 1897, covered in by Executive order about the same number of places, about 27,500 places each. I speak in round numbers. I am quite well satisfied from the best investigation I have been able to make that there are as many if not more Republicans in the civil service than Democrats. It is not possible to be accurate, for the information can not be obtained.

The Auditor for the Post-Office Department testified that the total number of his subordinates was 487—216 of whom were Democrats and 271 Republicans. Four hundred and forty-nine were in the classified service, of whom 191 were Democrats and 258 Republicans. When Cleveland was inaugurated the second time the Public Printer and a majority of his subordinates were Republicans. It is in testimony that when the present Public Printer entered upon his duties under his present appointment 70 per cent of the force in his bureau were there when he surrendered the office to Mr. Benedict in May, 1894.

In the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency three-fourths of the clerks are Republicans. In the Pension Bureau on March 20, 1897, the Commissioner of Pensions informed me that as nearly as it could be ascertained, 418 Democrats and 886 Republicans held clerical positions. The medical examiners stood 24 Democrats and 18 Republicans. These instances, as far as they go, tend to correct the error into which many people have fallen in assuming that the civil service of the country is disproportionately filled with Democrats.

So, too, a misapprehension exists as to the board of pension surgeons. It is currently believed that over 4,000 pension surgeons are in the classified service and, therefore, removed from political influence, whereas in fact only 14 per cent of the pension surgeons are in the classified service, as the following letter from the Commissioner of Pensions shows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, January 3, 1898.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 22d ultimo, I have the honor to inform you that there are in the United States 1,389 boards of examining surgeons for this Bureau, of three members each, and 255 single surgeons.

Of this number, 205 boards are within the classified service, having been so placed by the Executive order dated May 6, 1896.

Very respectfully,

H. CLAY EVANS, Commissioner.

A belief in these exaggerated statements about the ratio of the two parties in the civil service has had much to do with producing the widespread dissatisfaction which exists. Of course this would be no excuse for cutting down the classified service and opening those fair fields again to the ravages of the spoils system. Some of us have our indignation so kindled at abuses which work injustice and outrage upon our friends by their removal or reduction in the service that we are guilty of gross sins against logic and sense by holding the law responsible for wrongs with which it has no connection, forgetting in the frenzy of our sympathy for the injured that but for the law the wrongs would be ten times more numerous and outrageous. The trouble we inveigh against is the spoils system, which, driven from the outside by our system of examinations, has found an asylum on the inside and works its deviltry in the very shadow of the altar.

To advocate the repeal of the law or its material modification removing any considerable portion of the service from classification would be to compound the greater sin of universal spoils to save our souls from being harrowed by the lesser one which survives in the remnant of spoils that remains within the service. The correction of abuses within the service in the way of improper promotions or reductions or removals lies in the hands of the President of the United States. He has already gone far to correct that difficulty by his order requiring charges to be placed on record before removals are made. That, as far as it goes, seems to dispense with the necessity of legislation looking to its correction. In the last Congress I introduced a bill, which was reported favorably from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service and placed upon the Calendar, making it a penal offense for any appointing officer to remove or reduce an employee for political reasons.

If the existing orders are faithfully executed, there will be no necessity for such legislation. We require a good deal of patience and forbearance in the treatment of this subject in order to get our competitive system fully established, because there is no mode of making extensions to previously uncovered branches of the service, excepting at times when we would naturally expect the places affected to be filled with an undue proportion of the party in power at the time the extension is made. This has been so under all Administrations. I think we may all profit by the example of Secretary Herbert's generous and magnanimous treatment of the navy-yards when he came into office as Secretary of the Navy under the last Cleveland Administration. He realized the necessity of starting somewhere to treat the service upon a nonpartisan basis, and though he found that branch of the service to a large extent filled with Republicans, he did not remove them except for cause, and in his annual report he sets forth the reasons, which must commend themselves to every fair mind.

SECRETARY HERBERT'S VIEWS.

I find in the judicious and patriotic treatment of the situation by Secretary Herbert, of the Navy, an example worthy of all commendation. His last report contains these highly sensible observations:

> When your Administration began there was in operation a system of civil-service rules for the employment of labor at navy-yards which was working smoothly. These rules had been devised by my predecessor, Secretary Tracy, and when they went into operation the places were largely filled by the adherents of the party then in power. This consideration was earnestly and repeatedly pressed upon me as a reason why I should disregard the rules until the representation of political parties should be equalized.
> I did not fail to see the force of this argument, but, on the other hand, it was to be considered that if such a system was ever to be in force it must have a beginning, and that if the first Secretary coming in after the adoption of the rules, against which the only objection was the present inequality of political representation, should attempt equalization from this standpoint, every succeeding Secretary would have excuse for taking his bite at the cheese, and so the prospect would be that the whole system would be eventually nibbled away to nothing. It was therefore determined that for the good of the Government the system should be adhered to, and this course has been pursued faithfully.

THE MIDDLE GROUND.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I stated earlier in the discussion that I stood on middle ground, and I invited the members of the committee to stand with me on that ground. I want now to state more specifically what that ground is.

The public good is the supreme law. Public office is a public trust, to be administered in advancement of the public good. The civil service of the United States does not belong to any party or faction, but to the whole people. They are to have the best and most efficient service attainable.

There is no excuse for putting on the Government an average servant when it can just as well obtain a superior one. To obtain the best servants the suitable way is to select them with reference to their fitness to serve. This requires an examination of some kind to ascertain their qualifications. When examined, those best qualified, as tested by the examination, must go on an eligible list and be certified in the order of their percentages when vacancies occur.

This system, as a matter of course, excludes all political or partisan considerations. That system has been in operation in a large part of our civil service for many years. It has given great satisfaction and greatly improved the efficiency and economy of service.

Since the last extension of the classified service by President Cleveland a new question has arisen. It being admitted that some places in the service are suitable to the system I have described, and that some are not, the question arises, Who shall determine what places are suitable and what are not suitable for classification? There never has been in the fifteen years that this law has been in operation any discussion of that question. It arises now from a desire on the part of some Representatives to legislate out of the classification those persons who were covered in by the order of President Cleveland.

The question having been raised, it is necessary to decide it. Believing, as I do, that some places have been covered into the classified service that ought to remain out, it follows that in some way they now should be taken out. The chief difference between myself and those who advocate legislative interference at this point with the civil service is that they think the places should be taken out of classification by legislative enactment, whereas I believe it more suitable and more conformable to the best interests of the service to have any needful modifications made by the executive branch of the Government.

NOT A LEGISLATIVE FUNCTION.

The principle of legislative interference either to place in or to take out of the classified service particular places involves the seeming absurdity of passing a law whenever it is discovered that one or another place has by mistake got into the classification when it ought to be out. It seems to me that this is not a legislative function. The executive department of the Government is responsible for the executive service. The law and the Constitution confer upon it power to regulate the discipline of the service and the extent of classification on its own view of what will best promote the betterment of the service.

Members of Congress are not as capable of judging of the propriety of putting a particular place in or out of the classification as are the Executive Departments, who are constantly in touch with the service and are conversant with its needs.

It therefore seems to me obvious that the better view in the premises is to relegate the duty of making modifications in the classified service to the executive branch of the Government and for Congress to keep its hands off. This view, which I call the middle ground, whereon I hope the members of the House will in the end come to stand with me, has received the favor of all parties for the last fifteen years, for no one until now has ever proposed an act of Congress to place restrictions upon the executive branch of the Government in respect to either enlarging or curtailing the classified service.

It has been generally recognized by everybody since the act of 1871, which clothed the President with full power to regulate the executive service so as to make it as efficient and economical as possible, that the duty of modifying or changing classification should be performed by the President rather than by the legislative branch of the Government. This was the evident intention of the act of 1883, known as the civil-service act.

Now, I regard this as a conservative position—a middle ground, upon which I should think honorable members ought to be able to stand, and especially when we have the assurance of the President of the United States, who knows that he possesses the power to make any modification which the betterment of the service may require and has given you his pledge that he is willing to do so and will do so as soon as he discovers what modifications ought to be made. It does seem to me that that ought to satisfy the judgment of those who have no other motive than the betterment of the service; and I hope, as I said in the outset, that on further and more mature reflection we shall all come to see that, while these modifications to a greater or less extent may be desirable (and I do not pretend to put a limit to the extent), the boundaries of the system must be fixed by its benefits; and there is nothing else that can impose a just limitation.

Mr. BRUMM. Will my colleague permit a question?

Mr. BROSIUS. With great pleasure.

Mr. BRUMM. If at any time the President chooses to violate this law, is there any way by which you can prevent him from doing so?

Mr. BROSIUS. Is that your question?

Mr. BRUMM. That is my question.

Mr. BROSIUS. I do not know of any way of punishing the President of the United States for any infraction of any law except by impeachment.

Mr. BRUMM. Very well. Then does my friend mean to say that the President would be liable to impeachment for making appointments as he is authorized to make them under the Constitution, notwithstanding the existence of this law?

Mr. BROSIUS. Why, Mr. Chairman, that is a most remarkable question. The gentleman sets up in contrast the constitutional power of the President over against his power under this act. It is impossible—and the gentleman, as a lawyer of the Pennsylvania bar, ought to know it—it is impossible that there can exist any conflict between the constitutional power of the President of the United States and his power under any statute. No statute can impose upon the President any duty or confer on him any authority in contravention of his constitutional power. The Constitution is the supreme law of this land, and no enactment can take away from the President of the United States, or anybody else, any constitutional power.

Mr. BRUMM. It being, then, the fact that the statute can not take from him his constitutional power, what is the use of the existence of the statute at all? In other words, under any circumstances, can not the President do just as he pleases with reference to this matter?

Mr. BROSIUS. I hope my colleague will not make his questions too long.

Mr. BRUMM. Well, that is a plain, simple question. Let me put it in another way.

Mr. BROSIUS. Oh, do not repeat it; I have caught the purport of the question.

Mr. BRUMM. Let me put it in a shorter way. In other words, is it not true that this act is unconstitutional? That is putting the question as squarely as it can be put.

Mr. BROSIUS. Now, before answering my friend, I want to make a comment. The lawyers of the House will see the character of the question. The gentleman has a right to formulate his own questions. But let me illustrate what I have observed all around me in this debate.

There was once an old lawyer who counseled his son who was about to enter upon the practice of the law. He said, "My son, when the law is against you, impress upon the jury the importance of doing justice without regard to the law. When justice is against you, you go to the jury and sound it in their ears that the law must be obeyed without regard to justice." But the boy said, "Father, what shall I do when both law and justice are dead against me?" "Oh, my son, in that case talk round it, my boy, talk round it." [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUMM. Are you not doing that now? [Laughter.]

Mr. BROSIUS. Now, let me illustrate the character of that question. The gentleman says, "What is the use of the law, if it has not diminished anybody's constitutional power?" Well, I thank my friend from Pennsylvania, and I trust he will understand that nothing I say of him shall be construed into evidence of discourtesy or unkind feeling. He knows that.

Mr. BRUMM. That is all right.

Mr. BROSIUS. But I think he ought to read the Constitution of his country on this subject before he ventures into the arena of debate. For when he comes to read that novel book, which he seems not to have found leisure to take up, when he comes to the section of the Constitution in question, he will find that it confers upon the President of the United States certain power; and I need hardly tell him, even if he has not read the Constitution, that no statute can abridge a power which the Constitution confers. But in that same instrument, when he reads it, he will find that Congress may lodge the power of appointment in certain subordinate officers.

Mr. BRUMM. And it names them. Do not forget that.

Mr. BROSIUS. And so will I, for I shall not depart from the Constitution. It confers the power of appointment upon the President, heads of Departments, or courts of justice.

Mr. BRUMM. That is correct. But it does not confer power upon commissions.

Mr. BROSIUS. My friend even acquiesces in the correctness of my statement.

Mr. BRUMM. Are you surprised that anybody should for once intimate your correctness?

Mr. BROSIUS. Oh, no. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. But this is not debating the question.

Mr. BROSIUS. I want to say to my friend that a very bright retort neither shows that a man is sound in his judgment on a question nor even that he is sane. My friend will excuse me for being reminded of the reflection made by old Polonius, I think it was, when he was looking at Hamlet, as I am looking at my honest friend. Hamlet had made quite an apt retort, and Polonius replied:

> How pregnant sometimes his replies are! a happiness that often madness hits on, which reason and sanity could not so prosperously be delivered of.

[Laughter.]

Now, I want to say that the Constitution having conferred upon Congress the power to authorize the appointment of certain subordinate officers by heads of Departments, the Supreme Court of the United States, in a decision which my friend has probably never seen—the case of The United States vs. Perkins—answers most effectually my friend from Pennsylvania. I will read the answer.

Mr. BRUMM. Give us the citation, please.

Mr. BROSIUS. Why, certainly, I will give you the citation. It is the case of the United States against Perkins, in 116 United States Reports, page 483. It is a very short decision by Justice Matthews:

> We have no doubt when Congress by law vests the appointment of inferior officers in the heads of the Departments it may limit and restrict the power of removal as it deems best for the public interest. Constitutional authority in Congress to thus vest the appointment implies authority to limit, restrict, and regulate removal by such laws as Congress may enact in relation to the officers so appointed. The head of a Department has no constitutional prerogative of appointment to offices independently of the legislation of Congress, and by such legislation he must be governed, not only in making appointments but in all that is incident thereto.

Now, in another case——

Mr. BRUMM. Now, Mr. Chairman, one moment. Let us be fair.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROSIUS. Oh, yes; I yield for anything in relation to this matter.

Mr. BRUMM. Certainly, because this is an important matter. In that very case, which proves the correctness of my position, the learned judge says heads of Departments can not have the power of removal or appointment except as delegated to them by Congress; but, sir, by your bill——

Mr. BROSIUS. Oh, do not make a speech.

Mr. BRUMM. I want to show you how poorly you understand the law.

Mr. BROSIUS. Well, do you not know that you can not——

Mr. BRUMM. Your time is unlimited.

Mr. BROSIUS. I know, but I must be fair to the committee.

Mr. BRUMM. You ought to be fair to me, then, too.

Mr. BROSIUS. I can not let you make a speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BROSIUS. I do not decline to yield for a question, but I decline to yield for a speech.

Mr. BRUMM. It is but one word.

Mr. BROSIUS. Then make it one word.

Mr. BRUMM. And that is, that you want to give the power to a commission, and that is not implied in that decision.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The commission do not appoint.

Mr. BROSIUS. Now, my colleague says I want to give the power to a commission. What is the matter with my colleague's mind? I am reminded again of poor Hamlet. [Laughter.] If my colleague were Hamlet, and Ophelia were here and heard that statement, she would express herself in those pathetic words:

> Now see that noble and most sovereign reason,
> Like sweet bells jangled, out of tune and harsh.

[Laughter.]

Mr. BRUMM. And in your case she would see no reason at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROSIUS. How can I help animadverting upon a question like that? The gentleman asks me, Why give the commission power? I have heard something like that before in this debate. Well, I think it would be well for gentlemen, before they begin to debate this question, to take the pains to inform themselves to a limited extent upon the matters involved in the debate. Why, the commission has no power to make any appointments. They have never made appointments since they were born.

Mr. MAHANY. It is the same thing, is it not?

Mr. BROSIUS. Not at all the same thing, any more than it would be the same thing if you were to appoint them, and God knows that would be quite different from the heads of Departments.

Mr. MAHANY. Well, I think I could appoint a few friends anyway. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROSIUS. Why do gentlemen seem not to understand the functions of the commission? It is in every respect, save two or three, as powerless and helpless as an unborn babe.

Mr. PEARSON. Or as the Spanish Inquisition.

Mr. BROSIUS. They have very limited powers under the law of their creation. They can do two or three things, and everything else they do is done by the sufferance or at the command of the President of the United States, and when you send your javelins after that commission, they all pass over their heads and flesh themselves in the flanks of the President of the United States. I have felt many pains when I have heard assertions made here about that commission which reflected seriously upon the President of the United States and the heads of Departments, but I feel the acutest pangs when I hear my own honored colleague from Pennsylvania betray a total ignorance of the powers of that commission and of the nature of their functions.

Mr. MAHANY. That is proverbial civil-service courtesy.

Mr. QUIGG. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. BROSIUS. If it relates to the subject.

Mr. QUIGG. It certainly does. I would like to ask the gentleman whether, as a matter of fact and practice, under the rules, the commission does not have the power to limit the selection of any head of Department to one person of the three named to him by the commissioners?

Mr. BROSIUS. It has no such power; and there it is again, Mr. Chairman. [Laughter.] There is the distinguished gentleman from New York——

Mr. BRUMM. Another idiot! [Great laughter.]

Mr. BROSIUS. There is the distinguished gentleman from New York——

Mr. QUIGG. Now, I hope the gentleman will answer my question instead of abusing me.

Mr. BROSIUS. I was not abusing the gentleman from New York.

Mr. QUIGG. Just answer the question.

Mr. BROSIUS. I say the commission has no such power. This subject is regulated entirely by rules promulgated by the President of the United States, and the commission has no more power over it than the honorable member from New York.

Mr. QUIGG. I asked the gentleman this question, which he has not answered—whether under the law and the rules this commission does not have the power to limit selection on the part of any head of a Department to one of three persons named to him by the commission? And the gentleman knows that is right. [Applause.]

Mr. BROSIUS. You are applauded a little too soon that time.

Mr. QUIGG. I did not think the fact of the applause had anything to do with the question.

Mr. BROSIUS. The rules provide how the certificates shall be issued. The rules are promulgated by the President, and the commission obey the rule, and they can do nothing else.

Mr. QUIGG. The commission certifies, does it not, as a matter of fact, in making this appointment, to the head of a Department three names, and the commission makes the rule which the President of the United States gives effect to by his signature?

Mr. BROSIUS. They do not.

Mr. QUIGG. And under that rule the head of a Department is required to select one of the three certified for the appointment. Is not that the fact?

Mr. BROSIUS. It is, if properly stated, but not the fact as you stated it inadvertently; you got it wrong. I will state it as I understand it, and everybody else who has looked at it will so understand it. The President promulgates the rules requiring these names to be put onto the list. The law regulates the means by which in regular progress the names go on the list. That is all in pursuance of law, and when a vacancy exists and an appointment is to be made, the rule requires the commission to certify the three highest on the list, and in doing so they are exercising precisely the power the gentleman's clerk exercises when he commands him to bring him a parcel or a package.

Mr. QUIGG. And the head of a Department must select one of three persons who have been certified?

Mr. BROSIUS. Certainly; because the rule promulgated requires it, with certain exceptions.

Mr. QUIGG. That is just what I said a while ago.

Mr. BROSIUS. You were so unhappy in your method of stating it or I so unfortunate in apprehending you that our minds did not get together. [Laughter.]

I want to say now that I will not abuse the courtesy of the House any longer. [Cries of "Go on!"] Somebody else desires to speak. There are a great many things I should have liked to say [cries of "Go on!"], but I shall not abuse the courtesy of the House and consume more time.

Mr. PEARSON. We have interrupted the gentleman, and I hope that full compensation will be made.

Mr. BROSIUS. Having made myself fairly clear as to what I regard the safe middle-ground on which we are to stand in this exigency, I want to say that whatever other honorable members may think—and they are all perfectly sincere, I have no manner of doubt, however much they may disagree with me—I do not think less of them. I have the highest esteem for them all, and especially for my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who is not in his seat, for he knows how high he stands in my esteem and affection. But I say now, in conclusion, as I stated in the beginning, the only proper system for our executive civil service is one whose boundaries must be fixed by its benefits, and I want those boundaries to be fixed by the executive department of the Government, who are in touch with the service and are conversant with its needs.

They have indicated a number of instances of individual places which ought to be removed from the classified service. I know the President, after having conferred with the heads of Departments, can arrive at a just conclusion as to what will promote the betterment of the service. I do not question the power of Congress to legislate upon this subject. I never did question the power, but I am questioning the wisdom of any legislation in that direction. God Himself can only exercise His omnipotence within the limits imposed by His omniscience. We ought to have wisdom enough to know when to exercise our power to its limit and when to stay our hand.

Now, I want us to be wise upon this matter and uphold the arms of this Administration. You all remember—my friend from New York [Mr. MAHANY], I know remembers—how Israel prospered when Aaron and Hur held up the arms of Moses. Let the Republican party rally around this Administration and help it to honor its own party pledges.

CONCLUSION.

I have said enough. I stand on the impregnable rock of seven consecutive platforms of the Republican party of the United States, covering twenty-six years; sanctioned and upheld by six Republican Administrations, together with what I believe to be the preponderating sentiment of my own constituents as I can ascertain it from the editorial expression of the leading Republican papers published in the capital city of my district. If I can not safely stand on that platform thus fortified and supported, I am sure I do not know where I can safely place my feet.

But whether safe or unsafe, my position has the sanction of my judgment and my conscience. I remember the shipmaster in the story and it gives me courage to be steadfast in my convictions. The shipmaster prayed to Neptune: "O, god, thou canst save me if thou wilt, or destroy me, but however it be, I will hold my rudder true." It was Washington's sage reflection that the standard to which the wise and honest will repair is also the standard to which the whole people will rally at last if it but be held long and steadily enough on high to be seen by all. So I ask the members on the Republican side of this Chamber to rally round the Republican banner and stand with me on this conservative middle-ground.

Let us uphold the arms of the President in his efforts to redeem his own and his party's pledges, and let it not go forth to the world by his act or declaration or that of a Republican Congress that the pledges of the Republican party are as false as dicers' oaths. I hear yet the clarion tones of President McKinley declaring:

> The pledge of the Republican national convention that the civil-service law shall be sustained and thoroughly and honestly enforced and extended wherever practicable is in keeping with the position of the Republican party for the past twenty-four years, and it shall be faithfully observed. The Republican party will take no step backward upon this question.

That was the last utterance of the Republican party of the United States. As a Republican who indorsed that declaration and voted for the candidate who declared it, I feel that I am under an obligation of fidelity to it. I shall not be found among those Republicans who vote "aye" on a resolution of want of confidence in the President that I helped to elect, nor will I be found among those who solicit him as one of his first official acts to dishonor his own and his party's pledge and "tear the rose from the fair forehead of an honest promise and set a blister there." I shall stand by the platform and find my battlefield wherever I find its foe, until the principle of the competitive system is enthroned in the hearts of all our people and the merit system triumphant in the civil service of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask for liberty to incorporate in my printed remarks some further statements and figures illustrating more fully my position.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks to incorporate into his remarks some additional statements and figures. Is there objection?

Mr. BINGHAM. I would ask unanimous consent that for the next ten days members be allowed to print remarks covering this paragraph of the bill. Quite a number of us desired to speak on the bill, and we have not been able to get the time.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I call for the regular order.

Mr. BELL obtained the floor.

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Chairman, I did not understand whether the permission I asked, to incorporate certain matter in my remarks, was granted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] called for the regular order.

Mr. STEELE. I understood that the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS] was put to the committee and granted without objection. So far as that is concerned, I withdraw my call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asked unanimous consent to incorporate some additional matter in his remarks. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, this discussion seems to have taken a very broad range. However, when we come to consider whether the American people want to abandon a civil-service or "merit system," it is my opinion we shall find at least three-fourths of the people of the United States standing for some kind of qualification, for some kind of merit, beyond working at the polls on election day. But it seems to me that the thing which has militated against the general recognition of the benefits of this law is not the act itself under which we are operating, but it is the abuse of the law and the hypocrisy that has been practiced by every Executive Department since this law has been in force.

It also seems to me well that members of Congress should consider the position they occupy when they assail the present statute, because, I venture to say, there is not a body of men in the United States that have done more to keep the commissioners from executing this law than the members of this House and Senators at the other end of the Capitol. It has been hurled in our teeth from the head of every Department that it was impossible to carry out this law in its true spirit, because of the interference of the members of this body and the members at the other end of the Capitol.

Taking the law as it is, I admit that I am opposed to many features of it, some of which have not been mentioned in my presence, though I have heard but little of this debate. One of these is the life tenure in office. There have grown up in this Government certain positions that are offices for life. I think this is the worst blemish that has ever been put on our American statutes. I think it is the most unjust principle that has ever been sanctioned in this or any other body. I think that every article of the Constitution, every section of the statutes of the United States, that gives a preference to anyone in office over the toiling millions is an insult thrown into the faces of the men who have made this country great.

I want to call attention to the fact that we have a judiciary in this Government that has a life tenure. I want to say that there has never been a man appointed on the bench that the majority of the American people did not believe that there were a thousand more just as deserving, just as able, just as much entitled to the place. But they had not what is known in legislative parlance as "the pull." They had not the influence. In the interest of the official class that has brought on this discussion, you say a man shall sit on the judicial bench in this Capitol, shall be furnished all the tools with which he may work, shall be furnished shelter and office furniture, shall be allowed to fix his own time for labor, and shall draw $10,000 a year salary.

And when he has served up to the age of 70 years, this House, in the interest of this official class, has said that such incumbents may retire from active duty. Without pay? No; his pay must go on; but you have said that every old farmer, every man who has worked at the mill, every man who pays a nickel's worth of taxes, shall be taxed till death in order to support this retired judicial officer from the age of 70 years until he dies of old age. This must be done in order to provide a salary for this man who, during his years of active service, has been drawing an immense salary, while these other men who have by taxation paid that salary have lived a life of poverty.

I say that is a disgrace to this House. I say that whenever a man is put into an office of this Government for life, or when it is provided that after a certain term of service in time of peace he shall be put on the retired list, it is an insult to the system of Government under which we exist.

To illustrate the unwarranted favors shown to this class over other citizens, I call your attention to the judge of the northern district of Texas, appointed for life. He served a few years, was taken sick, and, as I understand, has not held a term of court for three years, and never will be able to sit upon the bench again. However, he is drawing $6,000 a year salary, and will so draw it to his death, though he has not served ten years nor reached the age of 70. The people naturally say, "Why does he not resign?" The answer is, he wants the salary that the law gives him. There is no power less than an amendment of the Federal Constitution that can authorize his discharge or demand his resignation.

Were he a janitor of the courtroom, a wood hauler, or any ordinary employee of the Government and should be disabled, he would be immediately discharged and his salary stopped.

There is appropriated this year $50,000 for the payment of retired judges who have served this Government ten years or more, and who are now drawing their salaries in idleness. This is done under the following statute:

> When any judge of any court of the United States resigns his office, after having held his commission as such at least ten years and having attained the age of 70 years, he shall, during the residue of his natural life, receive the same salary which was by law payable to him at the time of his resignation.

Why this civil pension list?

Why not pension the farmer, the mechanic, the miner, or the general laborers who have worked in and out of season to make this country great and have never received any favors from the Government? Why not pension them when they have reached the age of 70 years? Why pick out for a pension the men whom the Government has favored most during their working years?

There can be but two answers to this question. One is that, being under the law officers with a life tenure, it is necessary to pay their salaries to them in idleness in order to secure their resignation at the age of 70 years, when they are presumed to be beyond the age of good service. The other is a maudlin sentiment that has gained a foothold in this country for the maintenance of a civil pension roll, or, in other words, the building up of an American official class.

Let us see how this works out in practical application. There is one judge of the Supreme Court who goes on the retired list this year after serving more than thirty years on the bench. At a salary of $10,000 a year his service in thirty years would net him $300,000. One hundred thousand dollars of this would maintain him in comfort, becoming the position, leaving him $200,000 to maintain him after the age of 70 years. Is not that quite enough?

Why pick out the man who can, with ordinary frugality, have such an abundance, when he reaches the age of 70 years, as a pensioner? Why make the farmer, miner, mechanic, and laborer, after he has reached the age of 70 years in poverty and distress, labor on to the grave paying taxes to keep up the pension of this favored class?

Such a principle should be beneath an American statesman.

Is it not strange how the people hang on to these remnants of the favored official classes of the aristocracy of the Old World?

Is not it passing strange that the great body of the people yet tolerate and uphold the great disproportion between the pay and general consideration and deference shown by the Government between the favored few and themselves?

Is it not about time there was a leveling up of men more in accordance with their real worth than with these old vestiges of the ancient aristocracy?

The policy of this Government is to take from the least favored and give to the most favored in all of its civil pension lists and high office favoritisms.

The judiciary life tenure is the beacon light followed by all of the anxious hosts that are now seeking pensions in the different departments of the Government.

We heard it stated in this Capitol the other day by the Commissioner of Pensions that he has in his employ men who can barely get to the office, and who are in the way when they get there, whose services are absolutely worthless, but he has got to keep them on the pay roll. Why? Congressional pull, Congressional influence. When the friends of good government rewrite these laws, for consistency's sake let them put in them a condition that the different branches of this Government shall be again separated; let it be provided that no member of Congress shall go to any of the Departments and try to prevent the enforcement of the laws he has helped to make. If you go to the Commissioners of the Civil Service, they will tell you privately that members of Congress are the persons who have tried hardest to keep them from executing the law.

They will tell you that you have given them the chief trouble. Go to the Departments, and to every Department, and ask why they can not execute this law. They will tell you that you are the obstruction in the way. I know there is truth in that.

How is it that the spoilsmen with the patronage of this Government have blotted out the public conscience and rendered political morality a mere memory? Is this growing influence wielded only by the ward politician? No. It has its source with the very highest officers of the Government. During President Cleveland's Administration the gold-standard papers generally, without regard to party, heralded the information to the public that the President would withhold his patronage until a special session of Congress repealed the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act—that is, that he would put every office expectant on certain members of Congress, impelling them to act against their consciences and better judgments and to support the private will of the President, not for the public good, but for the reward of official positions for their friends.

Before the special session of the McKinley Administration the party press generally announced to the world that the President would not distribute the patronage of the Government until the members of Congress did the will of the President—that is, that the members should be induced by this high officer to avoid their duties and sell their consciences for official positions for their friends.

The last two Administrations have, through the corrupting influence of patronage, blotted out the constitutional separation of the different departments of the Government. What can be expected of the men in the ordinary walks of life when the highest officials of the nation, with impunity and openly, set the example of public bribery and purchase through patronage and spoils? The Republican press proclaimed to the world in general that in the State of Ohio the President was withholding sixty important official positions until the members of the legislature chose a United States Senator.

Why this withholding? It was to put every expectant of these sixty places onto the backs of certain Representatives to coerce their votes against their consciences and best judgment, and to put those places into the hands of his favored candidate to trade for political influence. These newspapers doubtless spoke by authority, if not by request, as their prophecies were always verified by subsequent events.

Not only this, but the public Treasury is now open to the most flagrant looting for political purposes.

The Republican press proclaimed to the world some ten or fifteen days before the Senatorial contest in the State of Ohio that Senator HANNA had called upon the appointees of the Government from the State of Ohio, the number of which probably ran into the thousands, whether operating in the State or out, to come to Columbus and there remain until the close of the Senatorial contest. Why was this? It was to put this great horde of office-holders on the backs of certain members of the legislature to coerce them to vote, not according to their consciences, but according to the dictates of the President of the United States and of the chairman of the national Republican committee. No one can estimate the enormous sum these men cost the Government during their idleness there, their salaries going on, causing either a great neglect of the public service or an increase of the force subsequently to do the work that they were neglecting.

The people of the United States acclaimed with great pride the beauty and simplicity of a pure republic manifested by Thomas Jefferson, and especially when he came to Washington, took the oath of office, delivered his inaugural address, and sat down to his desk and began the duties of his office without expense to the Government and without any great dress parade.

How has it been in recent years? I venture to say, if it could be estimated, that the induction of a modern President into office costs not less than a quarter of a million dollars. When the present Administration was to be inducted into office, the chairman of the committee asked for the use of the great Pension Building for a grand ball after the inauguration. The Government granted the privilege. Then they requested possession of the building ten days before the ball, in order that it might be decorated in a becoming manner for this great event. This was granted, and the thousands of employees were let out for ten days, their salaries running and the old soldier waiting for his pension, that there might be a great exhibition of splendor in this great building. When it was over, the Commissioner of Pensions, in an interview in a Washington paper, stated that the salaries of the employees while idle cost this Government $70,000.

By whose authority were these great expenditures made? There is no legal authority for it. It is but in keeping with the general abuses of power that have grown up in the greatest country of the world. Why was this useless expense made? It was not at the request of the incoming President. It is to the interest of the people of the District of Columbia to make this event of the induction of a President into office a great affair in order to create business for the local people, and the office expectants vie with them to put the President under greater obligations to them for showing their appreciation of his greatness. It is the possibility of the people to excel in spite of enormous expenditures and reckless extravagance that makes this country the most fruitful field for bad laws, political knavery, gross usurpation of power, and flagrant extravagance on the face of the globe.

A few weeks ago the Commissioner of Pensions, before one of the committees of Congress, stated that he could discharge 100 of his employees and not affect in the least the efficiency of the service in his Department. He stated boldly that he had employees so worthless that they could hardly reach the Pension Office without assistance, and when once there were of no possible use. When asked why he did not retire such worthless members of his force, he said it was his inability to withstand the pressure of Congressional influence. The Secretary of the Treasury recently showed that he had been required to transfer his broken-down and worn-out force to positions different from those they had occupied for years because they were superannuated. Why is this? It is this great influence of patronage. It is social and political influence. It is this indirect life tenure of office.

Why have we had such disgraceful scenes in Philadelphia, New York, Ohio, Maryland, in Delaware, and in other places in the United States? It is the outgrowth of the spoils system. The purchase of the public conscience has taken the place of conviction in recent years. It has invaded every realm in political, business, and educational life. If the educators in the great universities proclaim their convictions, and if they are thought to be in the interest of the great masses and against the moneyed class, the endowments of the wealthy are withheld.

We lately observed, through the press, that the mere statement of Professor Andrews, of Brown University, that he believed the free coinage of silver would tend to the greatest good to the greatest number of the American people was sufficient to call down upon him the anathema of the directors, because they believed that it would stop the inflow of aid from the great moneyed class of the country. It is said that because a professor in the great Chicago University proclaimed that in his opinion the mere free coinage of silver would not necessarily bring disaster upon the people, it was sufficient to secure his discharge through the influence of the money element that is endowing the university. And when one of the wealthiest men of the nation, a few days ago, made an endowment to that university, the gold press of the country congratulated the university upon its wisdom in supporting those who supported it.

Our modern methods are a stench in the nostrils of all thoughtful and liberty-loving citizens without regard to party. Those who have observed recent events must acknowledge that the old salutary rule that those in high places should govern for the "greatest good to the greatest and most deserving number" has degenerated until the motto now is to govern for the greatest contributors to corrupting campaign funds. This is not a calamity howl. You can hear from the college professor, political economist, and historian, if at liberty to express his opinion without the hazard of losing his place, the admonition much stronger than I can put it. You can read the laments of the thoughtful scholar in almost every country and his deprecation that "this is an age without a statesman." You can get the private view of every man of thought in public life, and he will express his alarm at the growing tendency of the corrupting influence of money and patronage in the governmental régime. With the acknowledgment of these evils by thoughtful men everywhere, why do they exist? It is the wielding of the dependent by the independent for selfish purposes.

Recently Hon. John Wanamaker, late United States Postmaster-General under Harrison, in discussing these corruptions in his State, said:

> The foes America has to fear are not the sullen, savage Turks, nor the insurrectionists of Cuba, nor the territory-grasping British, but our own patient and heart-tired people, our own suffering and much-promised people, who, betrayed and disheartened, no longer have faith in their party, and will turn to any leadership that offers promise of better times, believing that worse times can never come than those now existing.

Hon. Benjamin Butterworth, another high official in the Republican party, recently said:

> In almost every municipality and State legislature there is an organized banditti that demands tribute and sells legislation. We know this to be so. We do not guess at it. You know it in Philadelphia. And it must stop or it will stop the wheels of this Republic. * * * There are too many men who would scorn dishonesty in private affairs who encourage it in politics. Half of the world is going to the devil because no one will shout out loud.

United States Senator QUAY recently said:

> There must be less business and more principle in our politics, else the Republican party and the country will go to wreck. The business issues are making our politics sordid and corrupt. The tremendous sums of money furnished by business men, reluctantly in most instances, are polluting the wellsprings of our national being.

Ex-United States Senator J. D. Cameron, of Pennsylvania, said:

> The single gold standard seems to us to be working a ruin with a violence that nothing can withstand. If its influence is to continue for the future at the rate of its action during the twenty years since the gold standard took possession of the world, some generation not very remote will show in the broad continent of America one-half a dozen overgrown cities keeping guard over a mass of capital and lending it out to a population of dependent laborers on mortgage on their growing crops and unfinished handiwork. Such scenes have been common enough in the world's history, and against it we all rebel, rich and poor alike, Republicans, Democrats, and Populists, labor and capital, churches and colleges alike, and all in good, solid faith shrink from such a future as this.

You may talk privately with any high officer in the Departments of the Government, and he will tell you that he would be glad to take a contract to perform the public service in his Department at one-half the cost that the Government pays; that through this corrupt favoritism and what is called "political pull," the great masses of the people, the toilers and laborers, keep an army of drones sucking their lifeblood. This must be corrected before we will have a government either by or for the people. To do this, Senators and judicial officers must be elected by the people. All officers should be elected or appointed for a fixed term of years, that the people may be the inspectors to examine their conduct and hold them to an accountability should they wish to succeed themselves.

There must be a fixed term for all officers of the Government, that they may not become superannuated and worthless upon the hands of the Government and that these officers may not become segregated from the people into an official class for life. The moment a judge is appointed to the supreme bench he is taken from the people and placed at the capital of the nation, away from them. He begins to read only the metropolitan newspapers of the nation, meets in social intercourse only the celebrities of the land, and soon loses all contact with the people. When one loses contact with the people, he loses sympathy with their aims and aspirations. There must be more than the mere change or shortening of the term of office, however. The corrupting influence of money must be curtailed, and the trading in offices stopped, or a republican form of government will be an insipid byword in the land.

The masses of all parties have heretofore had a vein of general honesty running through them, but the leadership of these parties usually ignore all principles of honesty and act upon the false doctrine "that everything is fair or justifiable in politics." While such false doctrines prevail there is no hope for the people and no hope for a better system of government. The great fault lies in the failure of the people at large, who are accustomed to honest methods and maintain as strict honesty in politics as in business, to lead their own political parties. They are too trustful, and are constantly at the mercy of the designing politician.

The boasted freeman's vote of an American citizen is but a historic memory. Coercion of the dependent by the independent and corrupt purchases by cash or political patronage have become so prevalent that political immorality pervades all classes of society.

Some time ago the Washington Post said:

The investigation of the elections in Delaware shows that all classes of society are pervaded by political corruption. Rings have ruled so long and corrupt practices have been tolerated for so many years that the public conscience has become blunted. Demoralization is almost universal. In some cases we are assured that pastors of churches are hired to go out and work for the tickets. That even the churches have been politically debauched, so that some of them have been accustomed to receive considerable sums of money for the votes of their members.

As long as the highest offices in the gift of the people make the trading in the spoils of office the dominant principle of their administration this degeneracy will naturally pervade every form of society, even the churches.

[Mr. MAGUIRE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. WHITE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I hope that in the remarks I am about to make I shall not be regarded as a pessimist nor as one holding to traditions that are in the way of a more enlightened civilization. But there are certain tendencies, there are certain innovations, not only upon the statutes of this great Republic of ours, but upon the unwritten law, the universal customs that have existed from the very organization of this Government, that challenge a halt.

I have been somewhat amused—and yet the question is too serious to be made a matter of jest—over remarks of certain gentlemen here, taking the position that those who dare to question the present administration of this civil-service law are "spoilsmen" and are violating one of the cardinal principles of our platform. If gentlemen have never learned it within the pale of the Republican party, they certainly ought to have learned it before now from our Democratic friends, that party platforms are like the platforms of a railroad car—they are made to get in on rather than to stand on. [Laughter and applause.] If we are going to stick closely in letter and spirit to one part of our platform, why not stand upon the whole concern? If it is a violation of a party platform to stand upon the floor of this House and advocate the modification of a law that has been more abused than any other law, I venture to say, that has ever been upon the statute books, then why not stand upon that other plank in which we declared that we would extend aid to Cuban sufferers? [Applause.]

For years we have been receiving the accounts of outrage after outrage on that island; we have heard of the sufferings of those people from gaunt hunger; for years there has been coming over to us the cry, "Help us! Relieve our distress!" But instead of relieving those poor sufferers, every little barge that has started across the sea to take them provisions or shotguns or a round of cartridges has been run down by the revenue cutters of our Government. Those struggling people have received from us virtually no support. [Applause.] I would ask gentlemen who stand up here and herald in their places that we are in rebellion against the platform of our party, are you not, by your very silence, in rebellion against another plank of that platform? [Applause.] Let us be consistent. Let us, as representatives of 70,000,000 human beings, have the manhood to stand up here and take this incubus by the throat, modify it if we can, and if we can not modify it on our own side of the House, I say I will join hands with my Democratic friends to put it out of existence entirely. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The CHAIRMAN. Visitors in the galleries will refrain from demonstrations of approval or disapproval. [Cries of "Oh!" "Oh!"] It is the duty of the Chair to preserve order whether members of the Committee of the Whole approve it or not.

Mr. WHITE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, frequent reference has been made to the constitutionality of this law. I make no profession to be a great constitutional lawyer, but I think that the great character of Charles Dickens, "The Artful Dodger," if he had been present during the debate in this House and had heard the evasive arguments that have been put forth with regard to the constitutionality of this law, would have been driven away in shame because of his inability to cope with these gentlemen.

Who has the appointing power? The President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the heads of Departments, to whom, with respect to certain officers, the appointing power may be delegated. Where is the letter of the law, where is the construction that can be put upon the law, that will give to three gentlemen, known as the Civil Service Commissioners, the authority to make these appointments? But I suppose that gentlemen's arguments and consciences, in dealing with this civil-service law, are as elastic as the law itself, which is so rubberlike that it seems they can pull it about to make it fit anything they desire.

But, gentlemen, my opinion is that the appointing power rests only where the Constitution has vested it—where it has resided during all these years, and where it should rest to-day. The only trouble is that we have never been able to get this law into court. I believe the President himself is the only one who has the power to secure a judicial test of it, and he has never done it. Its elasticity is such as to make it a supple tool in the hands of any partisan. Talk about "merit;" talk about "spoilsmen." If there ever was anything that might be forcibly designated as a "spoils system," it is the present administration of the civil-service law in the United States. [Applause.] A law that at one fell swoop, without regard to merit, without regard to fitness, pulls its ample india-rubber folds over 43,000 men and women in one day is a bad thing for any republican form of government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to see the law modified, if possible. My views in reference to the commission remind me of a little incident which occurred when I was a boy down in my native Southland. It so freely and forcibly illustrates the point as to the commission itself that I will tell it, with your permission. One Sunday I went to church. It was a little slab church in an oak thicket. I got in and I heard the preacher praying. He prayed honestly and fervently. He broke forth in all the eloquence of his soul, "O Lord, have mercy upon sinners. O Lord, wilt Thou curtail the devil in his mad career." A good old deacon over in the corner said: "Yes, good Lord, cut his tail clean off." [Laughter.]

If I had my way with this commission, I would modify the law so as to establish a bureau in every Department for the purpose of examining into the fitness of each applicant for office, because the head of a Department knows better than the commission can know the character of the work done in the Department. Yes, I would do as the good old preacher said—I would not only cut off the tail of this commission completely, but I would cut it off close behind its ears. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, it is needless for me to undertake to enter into any individual instances of the abuses of this law. They have been so elaborately explained that it would be folly to attempt, in the few moments accorded to me, to enter into an extended discussion as to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHITE of North Carolina. I should like about seven minutes more.

Mr. MAHANY. I ask that his time be extended.

Mr. PEARSON. I trust that the committee will grant this request, and I ask that the gentleman's time be extended ten minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of North Carolina. I have heard gentlemen claiming to represent the "merit system" twit us, refer to us in derision as "spoilsmen," and say that we would bolster up our chances for a return to Congress by giving out the patronage of this great Government of ours to a hungry horde of office seekers. I imagine the gentlemen felt a little hungry themselves, as evidenced by their presence on this floor. I imagine, also, that if they lived in the district of North Carolina that I have the honor to represent here, if they continued to hold the views which they now express and to say that when we have won an honest victory their friends are not entitled to the emoluments that naturally ought to follow—if they should express such views as these in the Second district of North Carolina, after next November they would have the opportunity of joining John Howard Payne in singing "Home, Sweet Home," for the places that know them here now would know them no more forever. [Laughter.]

But these gentlemen are like Hudibras—

> And prove their doctrines orthodox
> By apostolic blows and knocks.
>
> * * * *
> Compound for sins they are inclined to
> By damning those they have no mind to.

They say the very facts that we instance as reasons why this law should be modified or amended simply show that the law is all right, but that the practices which have grown up under it are the only things that are wrong. Well, a law that permits of such pernicious practices as we have seen certainly needs some attention.

I want to say to gentlemen here, as I have but little time, that unless, in my opinion, you join with those who are here as true civil-service reformers and aid us in throwing proper safeguards around this law, so that it may subserve the interest of this great American people of ours, the next Congress that convenes here will do that piece of work for you, and you will stay at home. I do not honestly believe there is 1 per cent of the voting population of North Carolina that approves of the law as it stands and as it is administered to-day. Then we must choose between these evils. Here is a choice left to you. I urge you to join hands with us, because we are the true reformers.

We are the ones who would perpetuate some form of civil service. We are the ones who believe in merit, but we also believe, or I do at least, and I proclaim it as my doctrine, that to the victors belong the spoils; or, in language a little more primitive, if you please, the ox that pulls the plow ought to have a chance to eat the fodder. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I insist that this law should be modified, and modified radically, but if we can not get all that we desire, we are willing to suppress some of our wishes, we are willing to meet you halfway, and we ask you, gentlemen, if you would have this law extended, if you would have it continued, if you would have it operative, if you would have this reform go on, if you would live up to the principles of your party platform that you have spoken of, then join hands with us who are here advocating that proper safeguards be thrown around it and the end will be accomplished. Refuse to do it, and the other side will do it for you in a very short time.

Mr. Chairman, I have in mind two instances that occurred this week under my own observation. There was a young man who was famous for ballot-box stuffing down in the Second district of North Carolina, who came up to Washington under the last Administration, under the extension of the merit system, if you please, and applied to the Interior Department for a place. He was put in, and the record was written after his name, "Poor; a Democrat," and under the civil service. There was no examination; the civil service was pulled over him after he got in. I found he was salaried at $660 per annum.

I went down there yesterday, and I said to one of the officials: "I desire this place. It is not under the civil service. My man can sweep the floors and clean the cuspidors as nicely as this fellow. My friends have never been guilty of violation of law. They have never stuffed ballot boxes. They have never suppressed the votes of American citizens. I want this place." I was shown the record, and informed that it was under the civil service, and the appointment clerk of the Interior Department being a Democrat, I could not get my friend into this place, and that, too, under a Republican Administration. This man is there drawing $660 a year, cleaning cuspidors, cleaning floors, and dusting desks under the civil service.

I suppose the examination was something like that described by my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY] yesterday. I suppose he belonged to that class of gentlemen who have to undergo these great scholastic tests. I suppose he belongs to that class of gentlemen who have to be 25 years of age before they can get in, and who can not get in after becoming 45 years of age, in order to grind a knife on a whetstone.

I have in mind another instance, of a young man employed in this House some few years ago. He went down and made application for a position under the "merit system," underwent an examination and utterly failed. Afterwards he was put on the rolls at $600 per annum and was subsequently promoted from one grade to another, from one place to another, until under the last Administration he was made chief of a bureau, and is to-day examining papers for the poor fellows who are applying over here for positions.

Now, in the short time that I have had I have said nothing in regard to the matter of expense. The opponents of our theory say there is a curtailing of expenses. They say it is a saving to the Government, that it is purely a "merit system." Oh, yes, "a merit system!" Yet this appropriation bill, I believe, carries $90,000, and by the time you get through with the detailed clerks from the various Departments who do the work of this gigantic reform institution the aggregate will be at least $120,000 per annum. Yes, and within twenty years these gentlemen will be knocking at the doors of this great Government of ours and demanding a place in the Cabinet of the President of the United States. Why, like the slimy boa constrictor, they are coiling themselves around everything in sight, and by the momentum of their gigantic proportions they are seizing upon everything. Like Alexander who, when he had conquered the world, wept when he could find no more worlds to conquer, in a little while we shall find them with crocodile tears in their eyes because there is nothing else to reform.

In the light of past events, it is difficult for the thoughtful man not to be more or less alarmed at the continual drifting from the strong moorings to which our ship of state has been so honorably attached. A condition of servitude to a portion of our inhabitants was permitted to remain for nearly two hundred and forty years in the face of the specific letter in our declaration of rights that "all men are born free and equal, endowed with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

This living lie remained there for nearly a century, being constantly and vociferously applauded, until this festering cancer was cut away with a lance of fratricidal war of four years' duration, which left the body politic well-nigh dead. Again, under our amended Constitution, Article XIV, section 1, we have:

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

And while Congressmen are distributed among the several Congressional districts, presumably in proportion to the electors in each and their respective population, still we see Representatives upon the floor of this Chamber from Mississippi, South Carolina, and other Southern States where the aggregate vote cast in 1896 ranges all the way from 5,000 to 11,000; while other districts in the North, East, West, and some few of the Southern States had an aggregate vote cast anywhere from 30,000 to 50,000.

How long, Mr. Chairman, will this increased representation, brought about by the disfranchisement of certain American citizens, be permitted to go on unrebuked? Will the American Congress sit supinely by and declare its inability to interfere and cantingly say that these things are delegated to the respective States, while our organic law, the Constitution of the United States, is being openly violated?

Once more: We have the sickening spectacle of a few serious and very religious "missionaries" (?) and a horde of Shylock merchants visiting the Hawaiian Islands, presumably to civilize and Christianize the inhabitants there of.

But instead of these pious missionaries—these canting prelates—and the honest international commerce between the United States and this small Government, what do we behold? The ruling power overthrown, the Queen banished in exile in a foreign land, her property confiscated, the natives overawed, and in many instances murdered, and all this done by American citizens, and this great Government of ours standing by seeming to say "amen." It reminds me very much of the hypocritical merchant who directed his clerk to sand the sugar, to pebble the coffee, and water the whisky, then gravely said, "Come into the house and let's pray." Last, but not least, we have this commission, about which we have had such a lengthy discussion, created by a statute of the United States Congress, but, in my opinion, in open violation to our Constitution, daubed with the misnomer of "civil service," and later matriculated as the "merit system," which, if permitted to go on in its mad career with the same ratio it has in the last few years, will revolutionize the internal workings of our entire system.

I am loath to believe that it was ever intended by the formers of this great Government that we should ever be besmirched by anything that would have the smack of life tenure, inheritance, or any other way of acquiring an office except through and by the people, who constitute the Government. If watchmen, drivers, messengers, clerks, heads of divisions, and every species of officials now under the ample folds of this rubber-blanket concern, "the merit system," if you please, can be protected by the seemingly innocent little statute of 1883, how long will it be before this happy trio will discover that this "horde of spoilsmen" have not sufficient sense to elect the President of the United States and our American Congress, and take the whole shout within its loving embrace? Mr. Chairman, I think the time has come for us to call a halt, and if we have not the manliness to stand up and destroy this measure before it ruins our body politic, the electors of these United States will on the 8th day of November next rise in their might and in their wrath, and send men here who will do their bidding. Mark the prediction, and be goverened accordingly. [Loud and prolonged applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. EDDY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. EDDY. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped to address the House at some length on this question, but certainly anyone who knows anything about it can well understand that it is useless to undertake to make a speech on any particular branch of this subject in the brief space of time that is now allotted to me. I will only say, then, by way of notice to the House, however unwelcome the information may be, that I shall at some time during this session of Congress take the opportunity to express my views on this law. I now yield back the balance of my time to the Chairman.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 4221) to confirm certain cash entries of public lands.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, I would that some one tell me what there is in the civil-service law so sacred and holy that an intimation on the part of anyone that he thought the law could be improved should throw a certain class of good people into convulsions.

You may propose to change the primary election laws; you may suggest that United States Senators should be elected by direct vote of the people; you may be in favor of a change in the immigration laws; you may insist on annexing Hawaii; you may agree or disagree with the Secretary of the Treasury as to financial theories; you may be for or against the recognition of belligerent rights for the Cubans; you may differ in all of these great national questions and still be recognized as a worthy citizen of this great country; but mention an amendment to the civil-service law and the whole set of impracticables exclaim:

Unclean!!!

Unclean!!!

Unclean!!!

But there are others. So, Mr. Chairman, I will, with the indulgence of this House, state that "civil service" seems to be a very catching word. On the name of the law alone thousands uphold the law and denounce anyone who does not do so. Few of the most pronounced advocates of the law have ever read it, and know less of its use and misuse. Why, sir, at the meeting of the National Board of Trade, which was held in this city last month, a resolution was passed approving of the civil-service law. After they had adjourned I met a number of the members, and the conversation drifted to this subject, and of course I was interviewed concerning the question. I found that not one of the gentlemen I talked with had ever read the law; not one of them knew anything at all as to the extension of the service by Executive orders, and they never dreamed that there was now in the service anyone who had not been placed there by a competitive examination.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that it is not creditable for any body of men to vote on such an important resolution as that was, approving such an important measure, without having read the law and without any knowledge at all as to the use and misuse of it.

Should you ask me if my constituents approve of the way the civil-service law has been manipulated, I should answer, "A large majority of them are heartily disgusted and unqualifiedly condemn what has been accomplished under the rules and regulations of the Civil Service Commission." In this I speak advisedly, first, because our State convention, at its meeting in Toledo last June, without a dissenting vote and in positive and unmistakable language, condemned the misuse of the law. I am violating no secrets of that committee room when I say that a majority of the committee on resolutions would have reported, had it been thought advisable, a resolution even condemning the law itself. No one who is conversant with the sentiments of that body doubts, had such a resolution been presented to the convention, it would have been adopted by a large majority. A gentleman who posed in the last Ohio State senate as the representative of the Civil Service Bureau presented a resolution to our committee at the Toledo convention committing our party of the State to the merit system as applying to employees of the different State and county offices, and his resolution was tabled by an almost unanimous vote of the committee. Had such a resolution been presented to that convention, it would no doubt have been tabled by a two-thirds vote.

I have further evidence as to the views of my constituency on this subject in that one of our Cincinnati papers, the Post, a paper having as large a circulation as any in the State, submitted to a vote the question for repeal of the civil-service law, and when the contest closed it was shown that over nine out of every ten who voted were in favor of absolute repeal of the law.

One of the Representatives from Indiana recently, in a debate on this floor, seemed to be fearful that Congressmen from Ohio (particularly Mr. BROWN) were not in accord with our party in that State on this great question, and quoted the Cincinnati Daily Commercial-Tribune in justification of what he had said. I will quote the Times-Star, a Cincinnati paper, owned and published by my predecessor, Hon. C. P. Taft. In its issue of December 29 it says, under the head of "BROWN indorsed:"

The Sixth district Republican Congressional committee met in this city Tuesday evening. The committee indorsed the action taken by their Congressman, SETH W. BROWN, in favor of repealing the civil-service law, and pledged Mr. BROWN a renomination.

Now, I hope our Indiana friend may rest his soul in peace as to how well we are representing the views of our constituency, and, as he has made the Commercial-Tribune his witness, I hope he will not consider it out of place if I, too, refer to this paper for some information on this subject.

In its issue of December 16 it has editorially:

If our lawmakers at Washington act upon the question in any manner, they should further improve and strengthen the service, in order that its possible imperfections may be eliminated.

Now, I do not see anything in that editorial with which I am not fully in accord. I heartily approve the sentiments as expressed, and will work and vote to "eliminate" all "imperfections" I discover in the use and application of the law, and I trust the Indiana gentleman will no longer characterize Congressmen from Ohio who differ from him, when we are following the same guide he selected.

In this same paper and the same editorial we find the following:

Reading the platform of the national Republican party as reported by a distinguished Senator from Ohio, and adopted in St. Louis, June 18, 1896, he will find the following embodied in that declaration of principles, viz: "The civil-service law was placed on the statute book by the Republican party, which has always sustained it, and we renew our repeated declarations that it shall be thoroughly and heartily and honestly enforced."

And the editor adds for himself that "that political creed suits the Commercial-Tribune," and I presume it suits every Ohio Congressman who believes in reform in the civil-service law as used and misused, and that, too, without any reservation, except that it is not a fact that the civil-service law was a Republican measure or in any true sense placed on the statute book by the Republican party.

The law should be thoroughly and heartily and honestly enforced while it is a law. It is not being honestly enforced. I am not so much complaining of the law itself; I am not so much in opposition as to what was its original intent; but I am and always shall be opposed to what has been done and accomplished in the name of civil service. The records show that this bill would never have become a law had any one of its advocates at that time intimated what could and would be done under the sanction of the law.

Mr. Chairman, I feel myself like writing an editorial on the party platform. I would have it read as follows:

Reading the platform of the national Republican party as reported by a distinguished Senator from Ohio and adopted in St. Louis on June 18, 1896, he will find the following embodied in that declaration of principles: "We watch with deep and abiding interest the heroic battle of the Cuban patriots against cruelty and oppression, and our hopes go out for the full success of their determined conquests for liberty. The Government of Spain having lost control of Cuba, and being unable to protect the lives or property of American citizens, or to comply with its treaty obligations, we believe that the Government of the United States should use its active influence and good offices to restore peace and give independence to the island."

That political creed suits, and we stand squarely upon it. How stands our editorial friend as to that declaration of principles? I know how our editorial friends stood the day after the distinguished Senator from Ohio, referred to as having reported our platform at St. Louis, had delivered in the United States Senate that famous patriotic Cuban speech advocating that belligerent rights be accorded to the Cubans, that speech which electrified the nation and gave hope to the Cuban patriots. I know how they stood then; but I may say a new light appears to have come over the vision of our editorial friends, so that little, if anything, has since been said about the distinguished Ohio Senator's patriotic speech or in favor of carrying out the sacred pledge made by our party as to suffering, prostrate, and bleeding Cuba.

We should stand by the whole platform in order that we may be consistent in demanding that any particular part be carried out. It is possible that conditions have so changed since this resolution was made a part of our party platform that the party is not now bound to execute the promises made.

For my part, I can not discover that Spain has recovered control of Cuba. I am not informed that Spain is now able to protect the lives of resident American citizens. I have no information that Spain is able to comply with its treaty obligations, and therefore I "watch with deep and abiding interest the heroic battle of the Cuban patriots, and our hopes still go out for the full success of their determined contest for liberty;" and I trust the Government of the United States will actively use its influence and good offices to restore peace and give independence to the island.

If the conditions have changed in relation to Cuba in the essential parts mentioned in our party platform, I trust our friends who quote our party platform so fluently will make it clear, for the country is asking the question.

I feel like congratulating the Administration for the opportunity it has given our charitably disposed people to contribute of their abundance toward the relief of the hungry, suffering noncombatants of the Island of Cuba. I have no doubt that the country will respond liberally, and while comfort and hope will follow this tangible evidence of our friendship to the particular class, how 70,000,000 people would rejoice if some encouraging message could be sent to the patriots we were "watching with a deep and abiding interest" in June, 1896.

Mr. Chairman, I received a message a few days since from one of my constituents, in which he said he thought "the Government of the United States should use its active influence and good offices to restore peace and give independence to the Island of Cuba;" and my constituent added that if Spain meddled with any of our citizens in Cuba, to drive them off the island, and if they undertook to search our ships or otherwise make trouble, to "swipe" them off the face of the earth.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I must say that I was amazed at the almost unanimous sentiment of our press and many of our public men, as expressed by the press, in condemning in unmeasured terms the Cuban patriots for executing Ruiz (by Auranguren), the agent of the greatest tyrant that has existed for ages; the emissary of a corrupt Government, with a dishonorable proposition, with gold as an inducement, and promises for future betterment as the price for the Cuban patriot's betrayal of his cause and honor. Had he a flag of truce? What of that? A flag of truce does not and should never protect a man bearing a dishonorable proposition. Those who were horrified should read the history of our own country and the actions of our own generals in a similar case before condemning the acts of the Cuban patriot.

I would like those editors who indorse the whole civil-service business as it now stands to indicate that they would, under any circumstances, be willing to have their editorial or news departments filled from a civil-service list or by any civil-service examination that could be proposed.

Not one man in twenty would know a good item of news if it was furnished through and by the approval of the Civil Service Commission. The instinct for news is not developed in colleges or schools and can not be discovered by any system of civil-service examination to any greater extent than one's fitness to serve as an employee can be determined by the regulation competitive examination.

Gentlemen need not make light of a civil-service pension list. They should examine the record and see what was promised and protested when the civil-service law was under consideration in the Senate in 1883. Examine the records of that time and you will find that the advocates of the law claimed then that it could never be applied to more than a few thousand employees, and the law was passed and placed on the statute book with that understanding.

We now find that instead of a few thousand that 90,000 have been covered by the classified list, and out of the 90,000 employees classified and given a life tenure of office that about 72,000 of them were never examined at all; that is, the Presidents have, by Executive orders, placed about 72,000 officeholders in life positions without civil-service examinations. All these 72,000 employees were originally appointed under what is now termed the "spoils system," and they are continued in a life position by Executive order in just the position they were when first appointed.

From the present status of the civil service to civil pensions is as but a step is to a mile compared to what was the original intent of the civil-service law to its present application. A civil pension is, in my opinion, sure to follow life tenure of office.

Gentlemen may protest and disclaim such results; they did that as to the extension of the classified list when the civil-service law was pending; and we have found their words not true, not justified by results.

Mr. Chairman, there are thousands in my district who, like myself, left colleges and schools, with education unfinished, in answer to the call of our country, and went to the field in defense of our homes and in defense of the very life of the nation.

On our returning home, many of us, for various reasons, were unable to resume our studies. Our opportunity in that direction was sacrificed and lost.

The years we were absent in the field were the years that should and would have been spent in securing for ourselves such an education as would have enabled many of us to compete on any terms for official favors.

Now you take advantage of the situation and make an educational test in determining who shall fill official places in the gift of the Government. Instead of making the test one of fitness, you make it one of education.

You would absolutely bar us from any chance to secure a fair share of the gifts of the very Government for which we sacrificed so much.

A spoilsman, am I, for wishing to recommend some of these worthy men for official preferment?

A spoilsman, am I, for wishing to recommend some of the worthy sons of these patriotic men for office? Then I am a spoilsman!

These sons in thousands of instances have also suffered in consequence of the time sacrificed by their fathers while in the field.

I would never ask an old soldier to vote for me for any office if I sanctioned the conditions you approve of here for selecting the clerical staff.

Mr. Chairman, I hope it will not be considered out of place for me to say to my friends here who profess that it is dishonorable for anyone to seek a public office that I was nominated for Congress while absent from home and that I absolutely did not have an intimation that I was to receive the nomination.

I was elected by the largest majority ever given a candidate in my district for any office.

I came here uncommitted and unpledged. Now, can the gentlemen on the other side who characterize those who differ from them on this subject say as much?

Yet, Mr. Chairman, I am not unmindful of the compliment paid me. I am grateful for it.

I never asked a person to vote for me, yet I am glad I do not forget the fact that thousands of our worthy young men spent much of their time and did efficient work for the party and for myself.

Am I a spoilsman because I would like to select a few of these patriotic young men to share with me the fruits of the victory? If so, then I am a spoilsman.

I believe myself more competent to make selections for official favors from among my constituents than is any Civil Service Commission.

This country survived for many years without any kind of a kid-gloved gentry having control of all the Government patronage for the United States.

One would think, after hearing the other side on this question, that without this Civil Service Commission the Government would cease to exist.

Civil-service pension bills have already been introduced in Congress placing the old employees on a pension, and it becomes a very serious question whether this life tenure of office should not be abrogated.

The civil-service specialists declare they will never cease agitating the question until the whole 180,000 employees of the Government are placed under civil-service rules, and that, too, without any previous examination.

These officeholders are the most persistent, energetic class of individuals in this country. A good portion of the time of many Congressmen is spent now in trying to help these people who are under the civil-service rules in securing promotions or transfers in order to better their condition.

The majority of these employees are not of that passive, retiring, receptive class one would expect to find in the classified list with a life position assured them.

One would suppose that beneficiaries of the civil-service law would be living in sublime confidence that the workings of that law would insure to them absolute justice and protection, but many of them are living witnesses to the fact that a "pull" from and to the right direction is of great benefit in securing desired results.

These employees might have their organizations, compact and energetic, with leaders well versed in the science of politics as well as statesmanship, so I am sure it is not problematical what influence 180,000 of these people might exert in securing for themselves a civil pension list.

Life tenure of office is the most enervating system that could be adopted. Under such system there is little incentive to economize or to provide for old age, and an investigation will show that a very few of those under such system are making any provision at all for self-support in the future.

He is expected to be a machine, to be run by rule, and when he asks for promotion must be examined as to what he knows instead of as to what he has accomplished or done.

His adaptation for his special calling and willingness to accomplish all that is possible go for nothing.

Examinations as at present conducted are educational tests and have very little application as to one's fitness to fill the particular position to which he aspires. If any doubt this statement, I would suggest that inquiry be made of the many thousands who have been examined as to the correctness of my statement.

Those desiring positions should be qualified by experience or otherwise to fill that position. He should not be deprived of securing such a place because some one else is more proficient in geography, grammar, mathematics, or the English language than he, and that is just what is being accomplished every day through these civil-service examinations. It is the basis on which all positions are secured—and lost, too.

I do not believe in a competitive oral or written examination, for no oral or written competitive examination can be so framed as to deal fairly between competitors.

I am not influenced in my opinion from any partisan motives. I state what I believe and what the record will show to be true without any regard to party advantages.

As to the original intent and scope of the civil-service law, see what Senator Pendleton, the author of the bill, said on the Senate floor when the bill was on its passage in 1883, viz:

> There has been great misapprehension as to the methods and scope of this bill. The bill simply applies to the Executive Departments of the Government here in Washington, and to those offices throughout the country, post-offices and custom-houses which employ more than fifty persons—thirty-five offices—and applies to not more than 10,000 employees.

It is not necessary to quote further from the Senate record, to show what was then understood to be the maximum scope and the intent of the law.

In the House of Representatives, Tuesday, December 14, 1897, while the House was considering the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill (Mr. BINGHAM, chairman), the civil-service appropriation was under consideration, a member quoted the names of members of the present House who voted for and against the civil-service law in 1883, and, among others, named the following: Mr. BINGHAM, Mr. CANNON, Mr. BRUMM, and Mr. MARSH.

Mr. BINGHAM, chairman subcommittee on Appropriations, said:

> That bill was brought into the House by Mr. Kasson, then a member from Iowa, * * * and he at once called the previous question upon it, * * * and therefore there was literally no debate upon it. The civil-service debate was exclusively in the Senate, and during that debate not once, on the part of Mr. Pendleton in charge of it and Mr. HAWLEY, but frequently, was the declaration made all through the entire discussion that the effect of the legislation then proposed was to cover only about 10,000 subordinate employees of the Government. * * * As the gentleman from Massachusetts has stated, it has not been changed from that day to this. * * *
> It was stated at that time it embraced only about 10,000 subordinate officers of the Government, with 40 or 50 officials. I wish to say that if that policy had been carried out as originally intended there would have been no criticism of the extension of that service as the result of the order of the President of the United States in 1897, and there would have been no occasion for provoking the debate on the part of the House that will follow in connection with the appropriation for that Bureau. * * * I voted for the act in 1883, covering, as it was supposed to cover, 10,000 subordinate officers, but if there had been an idea * * * that this would have been extended by Executive order to embrace some 87,000 subordinate officers, I for one would have voted against it.

On this same day, Mr. CANNON, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House, stated as follows:

My recollection is that I did vote for it, and, Mr. Chairman, I want to say further * * * in that connection, at that time I was in favor of a civil-service law, as I am now, covering real civil-service reform. I did not dream then that by orders of the Executive the civil service would become, in many respects, uncivil service. * * * Where administrative functions are exercised involving the use and discretion, then the administrator charged with the conduct of affairs and responsible to the people should be at perfect liberty to have his administrative officeholders in harmony with its policy.

Mr. BRUMM. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me, I think I also was one of those who voted against the bill at that time, together with the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BARRETT. I omitted to use the gentleman's name in that connection. * * *

Mr. BRUMM. I am very proud to be included with them on that vote.

Mr. MARSH. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me to decorate his speech with my name, as one gentleman who voted against that bill, I would be glad to have the opportunity of so expressing myself.

Mr. BARRETT. I should be very glad indeed to have the name of the gentleman from Illinois included.

Mr. MARSH. And allow me to say in the presence of this House * * * that no vote has given me more satisfaction and gratification than my vote on that occasion.

Mr. Chairman, any amount of evidence from the record could be produced to show that the law has not been honestly applied; that in the name of civil-service reform, one of the greatest bunko games ever perpetrated on a confiding public has been worked by these professional agitators through the manipulation of designing departmental officials and others, with the approval of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the executive, advisory, and administrative class, which, under the direction and supervision of the Secretaries and Assistant Secretaries, include the chief clerks of the Departments, the bureaus of the Departments whose duties are of an executive, advisory, and administrative character, should be exempt from the operations of any civil-service law.

I would give a tenure of office of from four to six years to the clerical class, which should include all employees whose duties are altogether executory and clerical and dependent upon the direction and supervision of that class of officials first mentioned. I would apportion the clerical offices or positions of the Government to the several States in proportion to their voting population, and to the several Congressional districts in like manner. I would have rotation in office by making the tenure of office as stated, with a provision that worthy employees might be retained after their term had expired, at the discretion of the head of the Department or bureau.

I have the privilege of making the following extract from an official letter from a disbursing officer of the Government who disburses annually several millions of dollars. I submit the extract without comment, as it speaks for itself:

I find my position here a very embarrassing one in this respect, namely, that the entire force is made up of people who are utter strangers. * * * I feel that I am entirely out of touch with the office. While all seem worthy people, there is not one who has any personal interest in the personal success of my administration. There is not one to whom I would intrust the writing or the perusal of a letter pertaining to the affairs of the office, except of the most unimportant and ordinary business character. I feel that this is not a resonable or a proper relation. I ought to have at least two personal representatives in the more responsible positions. The proper administration of the office and my own safety certainly require it. If I had full authority, I should not make wholesale removals, but it seems to me that the good of the service requires that I be represented in the personnel of the force. I believe that you would be glad to have this done if you could bring it about, and I hope you may be enabled to do so.

I submit that there is not a successful business man in the country who would not approve of the sentiments expressed in this letter. I doubt the sincerity of any successful business man who says that one who is held responsible for any business or department has not the right to call to his aid such a staff as he knows from personal knowledge are interested in his success and the success of such policies as he might represent.

In conclusion, I wish leave to print with this some extracts from the testimony of Hon. H. Clay Evans, Commissioner of Pensions, before the present Senate Civil Service Investigating Committee, some time during the last month.

The testimony speaks for itself. Comment is unnecessary.

Q. Do you think it would be a good thing to abolish the civil-service system as to clerks?

A. No, sir; I do not. I think it would be a good thing to limit it. I was a civil-service reformer, so called. But it is a good deal like free trade to me; it does not work out. * * *

Q. What is the present arrangement in regard to the medical boards?

A. The last Administration put all * * * medical examiners, that is, the members of the local boards, * * * in the classified service.

Q. I refer to the medical boards.

A. Those are the medical examiners, the local boards. All the individual members earning over $900 are put within the classified service. That puts some whole boards under the classified service, or two members possibly under the classified service and one out, or one member within the classified service and two out. * * *

Q. How are they paid?

A. They are paid by fees. There is no doubt in my opinion that many boards were appointed during the last Administration because they were "soldier haters." You know what that meant during the war, and what it has meant since. Ex soldiers complain of it; they will not go before those boards. * * * There is a very peculiar condition as to those boards.

I hear * * * that the most experienced men, of long years of experience, men possibly who have served in the Army and were accustomed to amputations on the field of battle and know the result of such amputations, and so on, will not go before the civil-service examining boards, because with the young man who is just out of college, or is up to date, and in up-to-date terms they do not like to compete. This is the story they tell me. In consequence it deprives the Bureau of the opportunity of employing surgeons of long experience. * * *

Q. There is, then, an absolute lack of uniformity in the way those medical examining boards stand to-day?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Some are classified and some are not classified?

A. Yes, sir. There is no qualification that puts them under the civil service except their earnings, the fees.

Q. Those who are not classified are expected to do the same grade of work as those who are classified, are they not?

A. Exactly. * * *

Q. To come back now to the general system, that is, as to the great body of clerks in your office, are there many clerks who could be dropped from the rolls without impairing the efficiency of the service?

A. There are quite a number who could be dropped without impairing the efficiency of the service at all.

Q. Why are they not dropped?

A. I have dropped some along. I almost always get into more or less trouble over it. And now I could not well drop anybody without a court-martial. They would appeal to the Civil Service Commission and bring them down on me. They do not want to be dropped.

* * * * * * *

Q. It has been stated lately, as, of course, you are aware, that in a great many of the Departments here in Washington there is a considerable number of clerks who are practically useless, who are superannuated, or from some cause or other have become inefficient, but who remain in the offices, drawing the same rate of pay and really doing no work; that if the places were abolished it would be done without any view of filling them, and that there could be a very large saving made.

A. * * * Senators or Members will complain probably to the Civil Service Commission that some man has been reduced or has been dropped, and it ought not to have been done. Then the Civil Service Commission writes letters to know the reason why. * * * If I drop him for inefficiency, he will claim that he is one of the best clerks in the Bureau and will generally bring Senators and Members to prove it, and they get me tangled up then with the Civil Service Commission.

Q. I do not see exactly how the Civil Service Commission can interfere.

A. Oh, he complains to the Civil Service Commission that he has been removed unjustly, and they want us to explain.

Q. Suppose you were let alone, * * * could you not reduce that force and yet retain the same efficiency?

A. I have agreed to reduce it, and I have submitted an estimate to reduce it 95.

Q. Certainly. I am now speaking of the great mass of clerical positions, not the medical boards. * * *

A. * * * If you want a suggestion from me, I believe you ought to have a tenure of office, and there ought to be about 10 per cent of new blood introduced each year. That would do away very largely with the suggestion made a few minutes ago about men staying in so long. Senator, they stay in so long that they get into ruts. They do not do themselves justice. * * * They do not do the Department justice. * * * New blood with new ideas, coming in contact with the experience and workings of the Department to rub up against, always helps.

Q. All are indirectly pensioned who are kept in clerkships when they have ceased to do work?

A. Yes, sir; if the man knew he had a tenure of office, instead of living as a Cabinet officer or a Senator, he would possibly save some of his earnings.

Q. Now, there is one other point I want to understand. For filling vacancies and for appointments, is it not better to have an eligible list to draw from rather than to have the places filled by outside influence?

A. There are some grades that can be filled that way. It can be done so far as copyists and those who perform the ordinary work are concerned, but I would just as soon try to make a fortune through the Louisiana lottery as to secure * * * efficiency through the civil service. I like to look a man in the face when I employ him to do work, as you do when you employ a man about your private office. A person may pass a splendid civil-service examination, away up, and when you put him down to a desk he may be impracticable, inefficient, and the impracticable and inefficient are the fellows, many of them, who pass the very highest examinations. * * *

In my Bureau there was a very large number of ex-Union soldiers dropped out in the past four years, and I have reinstated many of them. There are either 105 or 107 that I have reinstated in my work. I have endeavored to pick out those who are most competent, whose records were good, and who were sober, industrious men.

Q. If you took all the recommendation of outsiders, why would not that same pressure, more or less, be brought to bear upon every appointment to be made?

A. * * * There is a very large element, and always has been, that are not disturbed. They were not disturbed during the so-called spoils system. They are men who hold their position just like they hold a position in business, because they are useful and make themselves useful. That is not only the case, I think, in my Bureau, but when I was in the Post-Office Department it was the same way there. Nobody tries to disturb them.

Q. The clerks who can no longer perform their duties are mostly old men who have been there a good while?

A. Mostly, yes; old men and ladies who have been there a good while, * * * and if I could have gotten rid of them it would have improved the efficiency of the service. There are many ways, Mr. Senator, by which a clerk who may be competent is an absolute nuisance among other people. They are quarrelsome, stirring up strife and trouble. * * *

Senator LODGE. It seems to me, from what you have said, * * * that the great difficulty in making the civil service as efficient as possible and getting rid of inefficient clerks arises from the fact that the head of a Department is trammeled in making removals.

Commissioner EVANS. There is a good deal in that.

The CHAIRMAN. Are special examiners classified?

Commissioner EVANS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Should they be classified, in your judgment?

Commissioner EVANS. I think not. * * *

The CHAIRMAN. What are your reasons for thinking they should not be classified?

Commissioner EVANS. They should be men adapted to the peculiar service. You can not tell by an examination what a man is adapted to. We try to pick out efficient men for that place, and we have been mostly promoting men to it. * * *

The CHAIRMAN. How should the chiefs of division be treated? Should they be classified or not?

Commissioner EVANS. I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. Why do you think not?

Commissioner EVANS. A man occupying a responsible position likes to call about him men in whom he has personal confidence. You never knew General Grant * * * to select his chief of staff from the enemy. * * * So far as politics is concerned here in these bureaus, there is nothing in it. The employees can change quicker than the Administration can change, and you do not know who belongs to one party and who belongs to the other. A man likes to have men about him in whom he has a little personal confidence. * * * I believe that the chief of a division ought not to be in the classified service. I would go to the other end and begin. To state my idea about it plainly, if I wanted to establish a civil service I would protect the charwoman, and I would protect the laborer. I would protect the employee up to $1,400, and when they get above that I would let them take their chances.

Senator LODGE. I understand, then, that you would not abolish the civil-service system, but you think it should be modified and limited in certain directions?

Commissioner EVANS. No; I would not abolish the civil service, but I would limit it. I would reorganize it. That is just my suggestion. I would protect the poor charwoman, if there is any protection in the civil service. I would protect the laborer, if there is any protection in it, but I would not examine him in astronomy or anything of that kind for the position of laborer.

Senator LODGE. The unskilled laborer is not now under civil service.

Commissioner EVANS. No; but I say I would protect him.

The CHAIRMAN. The law expressly provides that it shall not apply to laborers.

Commissioner EVANS. I know it does.

Mr. PROCTER. It does not provide that it shall not apply, but that it shall not be required to be applied to them.

The CHAIRMAN. It is prescribed that they shall not be included in the classified service.

Commissioner EVANS. Substantially. The man who gets above $1,400, in my opinion, is competent to take his chances in the world; he does not need any protection. In that way you would have a better service. In the long years you have been here you know that men have been in the Departments here and they are never disturbed. They were not disturbed under the so-called spoils system.

Senator LODGE. A good many were thrown out during the last four years.

Commissioner EVANS. There is no doubt about that, but they were thrown out before the offices were classified and to get others in.

Mr. PROCTER. How many clerks have you in the Pension Office?

Commissioner EVANS. The appropriation act allows 1,835. They are not all clerks, but it embraces all classes of employees, as you know.

Mr. PROCTER. I understood you to say that persons who came in through examination have more pressure behind them than those who came in through what you termed the spoils system?

Commissioner EVANS. As I said, the best men I have in my employ are men who came in through the so-called spoils system.

Senator LODGE. Prior to 1883?

Commissioner EVANS. Yes; and they have come in in various ways since, before the whole thing was locked and the key thrown away, as you know. There are various ways by which they were put in.

Mr. PROCTER. Do you not think it a bad system that would place all the chiefs of divisions in a large bureau like that in one political party?

Commissioner EVANS. No, sir; I do not. On the contrary, I think it is just what ought to be done. I believe if the people have elected the Democratic party to power, they expect them to carry out their policies. The last Administration, no doubt, had a policy with reference to pensions, and the Administration selected the men and put them in power to carry out that policy. They were, no doubt, friends of the Administration, and they were selected, no doubt, with that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. I wish you would give us your idea as to the number of years they should be permitted to serve, because that is the practical question connected with this investigation.

Commissioner EVANS. I should say eight years, and not to exceed ten. I look on this thing as divorcing the Government from the people. The rising generation feel that they have no interest in this Government.

Mr. PROCTER. As a general thing, young men are better clerks than old men, are they not?

Commissioner EVANS. Yes, sir. * * * I know that I could not pass a civil-service examination.

Mr. PROCTER. Was not the law of 1883 enacted for the very purpose that all citizens should compete for public service regardless of their political belief?

Commissioner EVANS. That is all true; but you may take two churches, and while they both claim to be Christian, they may differ as to the particular road by which to get to heaven. The political parties differ on political lines, and they differ on policies. So I say I believe in having those about me upon whom I may depend to carry out my will and wishes. I believe in having friends about me, and I believe the other party should have the same. I believe the Constitution of the United States was framed on those lines.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BAKER. You spoke of agency clerks a little while ago, and stated that they are under the civil-service rules. Is not the pension agent responsible for all the errors in his office by those clerks?

Commissioner EVANS. The law so holds him responsible for all errors.

Mr. BAKER. Under his official bond?

Commissioner EVANS. Yes, sir. * * * In the last Administration they turned out people in any way. They turned out almost anybody and they filled their places. I do not know how they got them in.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, we are about to witness the closing scenes of this farce that has been continued before this audience for six days. I have been making an earnest endeavor to find out what all this discussion was about, anyway. I am informed that under the rules it will be impossible to get a vote on this measure now pending either to amend or repeal the law that these gentlemen complain of, and so it strikes me that there must have been some other motive or motives behind those that permitted this discussion to go on. I think, perhaps, in the first place, that there was a fear on the part of the political bosses who are managing affairs and controlling the Government now that if Congress were left to itself it might appropriate too much money and there might be a deficit, and they thought that it was safer for Congress to talk than to expend money.

Mr. QUIGG. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. I only have five minutes.

Mr. QUIGG. Your time will be extended.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. If you will get the extension, I will answer the question after I get the extension. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another reason. There is a great army of office seekers knocking at the door for admission. Their Representatives here, to whom they look to secure office for them, must satisfy them in some way. So these speeches are made solely and entirely for home consumption and nothing else. [Laughter.] We witnessed here at the first opening of Congress after the holidays the very sudden appearance of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] upon the scene. The track was cleared, everything was side-tracked, and he was given the right of way and two hours to make a speech to use in the interest of Mr. HANNA out in Ohio.

A MEMBER. And he won out.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. That was the understanding. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] no doubt told the boys who worked in the Hanna trenches that this law was to be repealed and the door would be opened to them; and now, after the vote has been taken, and Mr. HANNA'S election is secure, I suppose we will be permitted to take a vote this evening. [Laughter.] I heard my honorable friend from New Hampshire, Mr. Salivator or Mr. SULLOWAY [laughter], yesterday make the charge that everyone who stood for civil-service reform was either a coward or a demagogue. Now, I have been looking into this matter a little, and I have taken up the case. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] is a very eminent example to us as to who is the coward and who is the demagogue.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] here in this House claimed the right to differ from his party and his party's platform when a great principle is at stake. Then he goes out to Ohio and denounces everybody who makes an attempt to justify themselves when they differ from their party platform. You see it makes a difference where you are at. Now, we have this example of demagogism pure and simple; so if there are demagogues—there are some—on the other side of this question, certainly they have a monopoly or a majority on that question.

Now, I am for civil-service reform; for a more stringent law even than we have. I do not believe it would be safe in this country of ours to turn political parties loose with the reward of office as a bribe for political following. Should you do that, gentlemen, all principles at stake and that are advocated by parties will be obscured and the ever-increasing horde of pie hunters, who often hold the balance of power in the country, would go over to the party that would offer the greatest rewards of the spoils of office.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Now I should like to have five minutes to answer the gentleman's question. [Laughter.]

Mr. LACEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more, on condition that he will read the Populist platform on this question. That was the condition he imposed the other day. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I have time, and I yield the gentleman ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LACEY. I will ask the gentleman to allow me to read the Populist platform for him.

Mr. QUIGG. I want to ask the gentleman whether I understood him to say that we had not power to get any vote in regard to any proposition with reference to the civil service?

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. I have been informed that under the rules of this House, so far as this bill under consideration is concerned, no amendment can be offered, and the only vote to be taken will be on the passage of the bill.

Mr. QUIGG. But did the gentleman mean to imply thereby that when this bill is voted and passed upon that we can not have a separate vote on this law?

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Oh, no; I presume that the gentlemen have the courage of their convictions, and will bring in a separate bill; and if they can get recognition from the Speaker, or a rule from the Committee on Rules, they could do so; but it entirely rests with the Speaker, as he is the whole thing and runs the House. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Therefore I take it for granted that no such permission would be given, and these speeches are all for buncombe, to enable the boys to send them out to satisfy the voters at home.

Mr. QUIGG. But will the gentleman undertake to speak for the Speaker without having consulted the Speaker?

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Yes, sir; as the Speaker never consults me. [Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I was about to explain my position on this civil-service law. The only fault I have to find with it is that those who are in power do not enforce the law.

It is well understood by gentlemen, and it is no use to try to fool one another. On the contrary, it is well known that there is no difficulty in getting people out under the civil-service law. You can get them out as freely as you want, but the trouble is you can not get the right fellow in. There is the difficulty. You can not get the man in that stood by you in the election; you can not reward and pay your political debts by putting a fellow in that fought for you in the campaign; you can not reward him at the Government's expense, and hence the objections of these gentlemen to the civil-service law. Now, if you can remove that, and the President in some way can remove that objection, you will hear no more fault found with the civil-service law.

Here is a case that came under my observation. Henry A. Robinson, chief of a division in the Agricultural Department, was a Bryan man. He would not bow his knee to the golden god, and he even went so far as to go home before the election and made some speeches for Mr. Bryan, and on election day voted for him. He was given prompt notice, as soon as my Republican friends went into office, that his resignation would be accepted on any day. He thought they meant what they said, and he resigned. On the other hand, a gentleman in the same division, a goldbug Democrat, who wrote the celebrated bulletin or pamphlet No. 3, of which the Republicans distributed 40,000 copies and considered the best argument on the gold side of the question that had been made, he held his place, and is getting $1,800 a year.

A MEMBER. He is worth it.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. He is worth more than that to the goldbugs, no doubt.

If we were in the habit of seriously considering the bearing of all that happens in the administration of national affairs, it would be very difficult to secure from even the majority in this House a vote for an appropriation of money for the continuance of what is known as the Civil Service Commission. I am not a spoilsman, nor do I believe we shall ever return to the old system of spoils-mongering; but it is within the knowledge of every observing member of Congress that the present Administration has more than made a farce of the civil-service rules. There is not a Department under the Government where removals have not been made for merely partisan purposes, and in many cases without even the semblance of regard for the law.

It is an open secret that the political fortunes of a statesman seeking an election to a high position has caused the profligate use of Federal officials for the purpose of advancing the failing fortunes of a Presidential favorite. Nor are we forced to rely for information upon this topic on the statements of political opponents of the aspiring statesman. We hear the complaint from men of his own party and standing with him for the great party of high taxes and low morality.

But there is little in all this that is worthy of comment. It has been so constantly the practice of Republicans in office as to occasion slight attention, even when following the bold declarations of the platform and of the Chief Executive's official utterance. He would be a very simple citizen who would look for the observance of the civil-service rules from a Republican Administration after the experience of the past. But in another direction we see evidences of progress toward an absolute despotism which should awaken every citizen to a sense of impending danger.

For years we have been accustomed so continually to the cry of "anarchy" during the excitements of political campaigns that we have ceased to note the progress being made in this direction by those who have raised this new cry after the old slogan of the bloody shirt lost its force. Nor do I expect that any words of mine will stem the tide or give pause to the men who act upon the assumption that they believe this country should be ruled by the elect and that they are the elect. And yet I want to utter this warning that it may stand of record when the people awake to the fact that their liberties have been destroyed while they slept. And I ask of the defenders of this Administration that they take note of the statements herein made and give such answer as may be possible.

We have in office a Secretary of the Treasury. That he is in some way accounted slightly better than his party is evidenced not only merely by the fact that he is hated by all the old wheelhorses of Republicanism, but also by that other fact that no one can answer for his partisanship nor foretell how long it will be before he will once more give vent to his feelings in the denunciation of "the hideous specter of the McKinley bill," under which terms he not long ago welcomed a gathered host in his chosen city. And, besides being so much better than his present party, Mr. Gage stands preeminently as the champion of the public faith and of "sound money." He is the banker whose wonderful wisdom is to enlighten the world upon finance. He is the great man from out of the West who has lived in so high an atmosphere that the odor of anarchy is not in his garments. Now, I want to call attention to a single action of this prodigy of statesmanship and ask if it be in accordance with law.

It is perfectly well understood that the United States Treasury is as full of barnacles as an old hulk that has never been scraped. It is an open secret that there are many incompetents employed in that Department, filling places that were "made for them" over twenty-five years ago, and that their services are not worth the ink with which their names are signed with wonderful regularity on the pay rolls. It is also well known that many employees of that Department have outlived all ability to render any service of value to the Government. As to that, we have the authority of the Secretary himself and of his subordinates, who have accepted the hints given as to a policy to be pursued regarding these barnacles.

It is openly stated by the Secretary that he proposes to establish a rule under which these useless employees may still hold their places and receive their pay regularly without doing the work required of them in the past and also without observing the plain commands of the statute. The Secretary decides that the pay of these persons shall be slightly reduced and then that they may be in some manner excused from a strict performance of their duties. As it is stated by one of the Treasury officials in an authorized interview, "It will be perfectly understood that if these old and superannuated persons fail of arriving at their stations at the required hour, the timekeepers will make no note of it, and their pay will go on as ever.

Of course the Secretary understands that we have no private pension system in this country, and that his action is clearly contrary to law. He knows there is a special and very stringent statute governing the matter of which he makes such light and that he has no legal right to establish a private pension system contrary to law. He knows that the law says what shall be the hours of labor for Government employees and that it contains no provision under which any Department officer can make exceptions. But this knowledge has no terrors nor deterrent force for the great banker installed as the Secretary of the Treasury. He sees a chance to make a rule that is pleasing in his sight, and pays as little attention to the existing law as if he had always been a Republican and had never denounced McKinleyism and all its works. And in this the Secretary is consistent with the record of most statesmen who have budded of late as the exemplars of devotion to the public faith.

And in view of the action of the Secretary of the Treasury, what folly it is to vote large sums of money for the maintenance of a Civil Service Commission. The rule laid down by the Secretary of the Treasury does away entirely with all need for an expensive commission whose members have become so skilled in bowing the pregnant hinges of the knee that they stand as well with Democratic as with Republican spoilsmen. If there be any need of rules for the governance of Government employees, why waste money for a commission when we can apply to the great banker at the Treasury Department and let him tell us what to do and what to leave undone. There is but one term to apply to the action of the Secretary of the Treasury in this regard. It is nothing but dress-coat anarchy, and all the more dangerous and contemptible because of the false pretense of its author. If there had been a law authorizing the thing the Secretary has done, there would have been no necessity for his order in the premises. And if there be a law directly prohibiting the practice initiated by the Secretary of the Treasury, then he should be brought before the bar for his conduct.

And there is another gentleman who has recently laid down his robes of office and stepped from the hidden to the actual service of the national bankers. It is well known that there are certain well-defined statutes regulating the affairs of the national banks. It is also equally well known that upon some points the law leaves the Comptroller of the Currency no discretion. For instance, the law makes certain penalties for the taking of deposits after the bank is known to have been insolvent. The statute makes certain very strict rules regarding the loaning of the funds of the banks to persons acting as officials or on the boards of directors. And yet the late Comptroller of the Currency published over his own signature a statement that he had for many months known of the violation of the statutes by the officials of a national bank, and had screened them because of the fact that an election was at hand, and because he believed that by so doing he might save the consequences of a big bank failure at a critical time.

Now, I do not care to discuss here whether or not the late Comptroller was as great a financier as he believed himself to be. But I do want to call attention to the simple fact that in the case of that Philadelphia bank he annulled a law of Congress and protected criminals in the violation of its clear provisions. It is not a matter for me to consider here whether or not Mr. Eckels, during his term of office, was able to save one or many banks by exercising a discretion denied to him by the statute. All that needs be attended to now is the simple and uncontradicted fact that he violated the law himself and connived at its violation by others, and of both these statements we have his own boastful confession. And we are forced in this case to a similar conclusion as in the case of the anarchistic Secretary of the Treasury. If Mr. Eckels is to be allowed thus to be a law unto himself, why should we waste time in seeking to frame laws amending our financial system?

We have still a Comptroller of the Currency. He has been anointed, as was Mr. Eckels, by an appointment to office. He has his course to run, and he will probably hold office during some exciting campaigns in which the friends of "sound money" will have to stand together. I want, therefore, to call attention to the fact that in the past the laws have been violated by the Comptroller of the Currency and that gentleman has gone to his haven in the bank parlor of his masters, reaping thereby the regulation reward of the unjust steward. If it was right to send Mr. Fish, of the late firm of Grant & Ward, to Sing Sing prison because of an improper use of the funds of the Marine Bank, then it was criminal for Mr. Singerly to do the same, and it was a piece of gross malfeasance for Mr. Eckels to screen him in the act.

But though all these things be made as clear as the noonday sun, there will be no action taken by the law officers of this Administration, who will carefully husband their powers until they can find some poor wretch who has dared to refuse to work for a railroad wrecker at starvation wages, and then every arm of the law will be outstretched for his punishment. And we shall continue to read the Declaration of Independence and glory over a flag that has been defended by bankers against the assaults of illy clothed anarchists.

There are a good many examples in history where republics have gone down on account of the spoils system. No more striking example, perhaps, than that of the French Republic that grew out of the French Revolution. When Napoleon took charge of the army in Italy, starved, half-clothed, and poorly armed—when they had crossed the Alps and looked down on the valley of Italy, he said to them:

> In that valley lies everything that you need—wealth, fame, honor. It is yours for the taking, and on your return from this expedition every one of you shall have wherewithal to purchase 6 acres of land.

The Republic had rejected all attacks of royalty, and held out its hand to the people. It had extended the knowledge of the rights of man, even as far as Russia, and made despots tremble in their own palaces. Under the watchword of equality and fraternity, they had brought hope to the dethroned humanity the world over. But as soon as these people learned, as they did later on when Napoleon invaded their country, that they were coming not to establish a freer and better government, but to plunder and rob them of the accumulations of their labor, then the reaction set in against the revolution until finally it culminated in the overthrow of Napoleon at Waterloo.

We might perhaps draw a parallel with the history of the Republican party coming into power under Lincoln, with a grand motto of human rights inscribed upon its banner. It made great progress in lifting this Republic to a higher plane of civilization by the destruction of chattel slavery. But in a few years it fell a prey to huckstering, trafficking politicians who were willing for the sake of office to barter away the rights of the people. As far back as Grant's second Administration we had the whisky-trust scandal. Garfield fell a victim to the bullet fired by a "pie-hunting" office seeker. Under Harrison the McKinley bill was framed and formulated in a committee room whose doors were always open to the manufacturing interests. Blanks were left lying on the table accessible to those robbers to make out their own schedules, so that the Republican party would have an excuse for "frying the fat" out of them for campaign purposes.

In the last campaign we saw that the unanimous support of the banking interests of the country went solidly to the Republican party because they had assurances that they should dictate the financial policy of the Government, and they are now clamoring through their agent, Mr. Gage, for the fulfillment of the contract.

We saw the railroad corporations of the country carrying a million and a half or two million of political "rooters" to Canton, in many cases free of charge. Of course it was understood that the railroad interests would be protected should McKinley be landed in the White House. And so now the Republican party, in order to fulfill its promises to this horde of office seekers, is seeking to wipe out of existence the last barrier erected between them and the Treasury of the United States.

After having repudiated every other plank in their platform (except that on the tariff) they are now trying to wipe out that on the civil-service reform, and this is the party that after having violated every pledge it has made to the people is now crying out for an honest dollar.

I am not of those, however, that believe that civil service (no matter how rigid) will prevent corruption in politics or in the Government service, or check or limit the mad rush of those struggling to hold a position under the Government.

I believe there is something underlying all this—something that the politicians have not discovered; and if one stops to reason upon the matter, he will readily conclude that it must be caused by the fact that men are denied opportunities to employ themselves—denied opportunities to engage in legitimate employment, and that those opportunities are narrowing every year, and the number of those that are struggling for places and jobs constantly on the increase; and so it must be until we have a race of statesmen who have the wisdom and ability to find out the underlying cause of this evil and apply the remedy by so framing our Government and its laws as to destroy the monopoly of land and other public utilities; and when you have abolished these evils, men will not struggle with one another and hound from morn to night their representatives in Congress and Senate and in the Departments for the privilege of eking out a narrow and precarious and miserable existence in Government employ.

I am a believer, of course, in civil-service reform. I would carry it even further than its application to Federal offices. I believe it ought to be carried into the different States of the Union; that the merit system ought to be put in practice in the States as well as the nation. I believe that out of this spoils system has come the political boss. I believe the country would have been spared the late disgraceful scenes at Columbus, Ohio, if they had had the merit system in that State.

In every State of this Union we are producing the political bosses who get control of the party machinery and are enabled thereby to deal out to the party followers the patronage of the State and pay their political debts out of the taxpayers of the Commonwealth. These are the things that have come to threaten and are threatening the destruction of a republican form of government on this continent, and unless the remedy is applied, and that speedily, we will be face to face with conditions that will border closely on the anarchy that reigned in the early days of the French Revolution.

Of course we do not expect anything along this line to come from the Republican party. I am one of those who believe that its days of usefulness have passed, that it has gone over and is to-day wholly in the control of the selfish interests of the country, the great corporations, those who wish to control its lawmaking power so as to rob the people. It is not the party of Lincoln, Chase, Grant, and Garfield any longer. They are but poor imitators of those great men who direct its course to-day.

Largely they are soulless corporations, hypocrites, who but masquerade in the grave clothes of their illustrious predecessors. A new force politically must be called into being, must get control, and apply these remedies, if the Republic is to be saved.

I want to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. LACEY. I object, unless the gentleman will publish the Populist platform as a part of his remarks.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. The Populist party have never violated their platform as the gentleman has his, twenty times.

Mr. BRUMM. They never had the chance, and they never will have the chance. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. ALLEN was recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. ALLEN. I am not a mean, hard-hearted man. I am no brute. It seems to me a man must be hard-hearted and wholly without sympathy who will jump on the Republican party in the straits in which it finds itself here to-day. [Laughter.] I did not get up to taunt you gentlemen on the Republican side with your troubles in this fratricidal strife. I came to tender you my friendly offices as a mediator, as your great and good friend. [Laughter.] I came here to try to help you out of your trouble.

Why, Mr. Chairman, a man who would attempt to take advantage of the Republican party and jump on it and pound it in the condition in which we find it to-day must have a stony heart indeed. With taxes going up and revenue and wages going down [laughter]; with Secretary Gage trying to retire the greenbacks and fasten the gold standard, and with many Republicans under the lead of Senator CHANDLER trying to stop him; with New York and other States going Democratic; with the promises to Cuba unfulfilled and strife and dissension in the Republican party everywhere, a bolt in the legislature of Maryland and a revolt against boss rule in Ohio——

A MEMBER. That is all over, all fixed up.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, I agree it is all fixed, but it is said it took a good deal to fix it, and I wish to remind my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS], who got after General GROSVENOR to-day, that he has a harder heart than I have. Whatever the provocation was, he should have had more consideration for a man in General GROSVENOR'S situation, who has been busily occupied in jumping between here and Columbus, Ohio, leading a bolt from the Republican party platform in this House on the civil service and coercing back the bolters from HANNA in the Ohio legislature all this time. [Laughter.]

I do not think it is right to jump on a man that has that amount of trouble on his hands. [Laughter.] It is true, I understand, the Ohio matter has been fixed up. I believe they fixed it according to the logic of the darky in Mississippi that a friend was telling me of. He heard a darky impressing upon another this fact: "I tell you," said the darky, "what de trouble is wid de niggah and why he don't prosper like de white man. He don't know how to transfer. Now, de white man knows how to transfer. Now, if I gives my note to a white man to git money to make a crop with, he transfers it to de merchant, and de merchant transfers it to de commission merchant, and de commission merchant transfers it to de bank, and dat bank transfers it to anudder bank, and every one of dem gits money on it, and nobody has to pay it but me." [Laughter.] "De niggah ain't gwine to do nuthin till he can learn how to transfer." It seems that out in Ohio several gentlemen in the legislature of that State have learned how to transfer, and the suspicion is that HANNA has to do all the paying. [Great laughter.]

Mr. WHITE of North Carolina. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question? How did he transfer 145,000 colored men in his district into 8,000?

Mr. ALLEN. I never had anything like 145,000 of them in my district, but in Mississippi we have transferred the voting power from an ignorant, brutal number to intelligent men. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] had something to say on this subject the other day. He also said:

> If this system of civil service continues, I will not get 19,000 votes next year; neither will the Republican party in my State present force enough to grease a gimlet to bore the hole to bury ourselves.

Now, I am not going to abuse the Republican party of North Carolina for voting last year for that party on a platform that said this civil-service policy should not only be continued, but should be extended; they are not to blame, and I will tell you why I do not blame them for it. There was not probably one in fifty that could read the platform, and they knew no more about the civil-service plank than they did about the other supposed principles of the Republican party. [Laughter and applause.]

I will tell you what is the solution which, as your great and good friend, I propose to apply to the State of North Carolina. Let us grant to North Carolina in this civil-service matter "autonomy." [Laughter.] I believe that is what the great and good friend of Cuba now in the White House is trying to do to pacify that unfortunate island to which the Republican platform promised aid.

Why, sir, the argument has been made here this evening by Republicans that they ought not to stand by the civil-service plank in their platform because they are not standing by any other plank. Well, that is logical. I agree that is a getting out place for any man who wants to jump his platform in any particular, because you can not hold a man up to any one plank when the rest are all violated; but I did hope, as this is a harmless sort of a plank, that you might leave the President, like the shipwrecked mariner, one plank of the wrecked vessel to which he might cling. [Laughter and applause.] But it seems you are not going to do that.

Now, I want to say a word more as your great and good friend. I have watched the progress of this debate, and I do not want any of you to be misled by this applause that the Chairman has been utterly unable to suppress in the galleries. That feeling has been growing here ever since the 4th day of March.

I recollect, as I came out of the post-office two or three days after the inauguration of Mr. McKinley—two or three days after I had heard those honeyed words about civil-service reform fall from the lips of the President out here on the front portico of the Capitol—I heard two anxious, hungry, sleek-coated fellows who were standing out there in the hall between the post-office and the elevator saying, "There is but one thing that can save the Republican party, and that is the repeal of this d——d civil-service law." [Laughter and applause.]

I have heard such remarks frequently since; and I have noticed here as gentlemen have spoken on this subject—these civil-service repealers and civil-service modifiers—they have heard this applause well up in the galleries, and as the anti-civil-service crowd on the Republican side has gathered strength, it seemed as if their position was taking the country. Gentlemen [pointing to the gallery], that is not the country. [Laughter and applause.]

I will tell you what I can do. If you will upon a given day allow the Departments holiday and let the Department clerks here turn out and attend this debate, the civil-service reformer can get just as much applause from the galleries as you fellows who have attacked that system here. You see you have been talking to the hungry army. The people who are in the offices under civil service are pleased with the system, but they are not in the galleries.

I will tell you what makes the galleries applaud; I will tell you what makes them howl. A friend was telling me the other day about a dog he had that howled and moaned at nights. The dog kept howling and moaning until this gentleman grew very weary of it. He did not want to kill the dog and did not want to give him away. He was talking to an old darky and said to him, "I don't know what to do with that dog; he keeps moaning and howling all night, and I can not stop him. What makes him do it?" He said the old darky laughed and said, "Why, massa, you raised in de country among dogs and don't know what make dat dog howl dat way? Why, when you hear a dog howl and moan dat way, he smells something and can't locate it." [Loud laughter and applause.] Now, my friends, when you hear these howls of applause from these galleries it simply shows that the crowd up there smells the pie, but can not locate it. [Renewed laughter.]

Now, gentlemen, I am not going to take any side on this question. [Laughter.] I am not going to make fun of you. I simply got up to tell my Republican friends that it seems to me, amid all your other troubles—being taunted on every side with your broken promises and with your failures; with the Dingley bill falling short in revenue and the manufacturers reducing the wages of labor; with Cuba betrayed, and Ohio and Maryland in revolt; with disaster, if not dissolution, staring you in the face—instead of this unseemly wrangle about a matter with which you will do nothing, it seems to me you should stay your fratricidal hands and love one another. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped to have an opportunity to make an argument on this subject in favor of civil-service reform; but the hour at which this debate is to be closed has about arrived, and I shall not undertake to go into any argument on that subject. I rise merely to ask the House to extend to me the privilege, if I desire to accept it, of presenting my argument in a different form and printing it in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FLEMING] to print remarks in the RECORD? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask unanimous consent to have my remarks printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWNLOW. I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech in opposition to civil service.

There was no objection.

Mr. BELL. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

[Mr. HICKS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Texas, Mr. BAILEY.

Mr. BAILEY. May I inquire, Mr. Chairman, how much I am entitled to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has eleven minutes.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, it is difficult to believe in the sincerity of men who in one breath profess to be civil-service reformers and in the next breath demand the practical destruction of the civil-service law. They might as well face this question now as later, for no evasion will enable them to escape it in the end. If the principle of this law is wise, then the law ought to be extended rather than restricted, and every proposition to modify it falls short of the real contest upon the question. The proposition to modify it is simply a subterfuge of the party in power to make place for its own partisans by dismissing men of the opposite party.

I understand the force of the arguments in favor of civil-service reform. There are but two, and everything that has been or will be or can be said in favor of it is reducible to the simple and single proposition that in this way you procure a more efficient public service. I do not assent to this view. It is contrary to the experience of mankind to believe that a man who is secure in the enjoyment of his office during his life will render better service than another man who depends upon his efficient services for his reelection or reappointment at stated intervals. The history of the world falsifies the claim of the advocates of this law that you can make any service better by removing the servants from the control of those whom they are employed to serve.

Direct, positive responsibility is the best possible means of insuring faithful and competent service. It is within the knowledge of every man on this floor that those who hold office under the Constitution for life are the men who most flagrantly disregard all rules of law. Without intending to assail the Federal judiciary, I state what is within the knowledge of every lawyer on this floor when I declare that you can take a judge from the bench of any State, clothe him with the Federal judicial ermine for his life, and instantly he changes his methods.

I have never known a Federal judge to deport himself when commissioned for life in the same manner that he did when he took his commission from the people and realized that he must answer to them every four years or every six, as the case may be. If it be true that you can procure better service by making these offices during the life or good behavior of the occupant, then the whole theory of an election by the people is a false one. If it is true that the clerk will serve you better when he knows he is to serve for his lifetime, it must be true that the members of this House, Senators, and the President would do it, and your civil-service argument subverts the theory of a free republican government. [Applause.]

There are those who say that you should take the offices out of the conflict of politics. I am very frank to admit that the man who only interests himself in politics in the hope of personal advancement could very well be spared from the public service; but I resent the imputation that the men who hold the offices only take an interest in public affairs for the sake of public office. Are you willing to make that accusation against yourselves? Or will you insist that you are moved by patriotic impulses to become candidates for the higher offices, while the men who seek the lower ones are actuated entirely by selfish motives?

You ought not to claim for yourselves a higher patriotism or a loftier purpose than you are willing to concede to your constituents, and I have no hesitation in saying that the men who seek the offices are as patriotic as the men who bestow them. This argument that you ought to take the offices out of politics is a kindred one with that which says you ought not have frequent elections, because elections "disturb the business interests of the country." It is a part and parcel of that ancient and exploded theory that the people become turbulent when they are called upon to chose their magistrates, and the whole of it can be referred to that old distrust of the wisdom and success of popular government.

I challenge the advocates of this law to specify when and where and how the public service suffered when men had not only to answer the Jeffersonian qualifications of honesty and competency, but also had to answer the further and sensible test of how faithful they had been to their party obligations. Edmund Burke never uttered a profounder truth than when he declared that political parties were indispensable in free governments. I believe in party responsibility. I believe that when the people vote a party into power, that party ought to be permitted to choose the instrumentalities with which to administer the government; and then if it fails to administer it honestly and faithfully, it ought not to be heard to offer any excuse at the bar of an enlightened public opinion.

This civil service must be repealed or it must be extended. There is no middle ground. If that law remains upon the statute books, it will ultimately cover every position under the Federal Government. We are opposed to its continuance and in favor of its repeal, not simply because we are spoilsmen, but upon a broader and a higher ground—we are opposed to it because we believe—indeed, we know—that it leads to the establishment of an official class ending in a civil pension list.

We declared against it in our national convention when we asked the people to give us their votes. We are prepared to declare against it by our votes here to-day. We believe that it is contrary to the genius of a free republic for any class to hold office for life, and we are ready to join you in tearing that statute from the books and restoring those offices to the people to whom they rightfully belong. [Applause.] We understand that the repeal of this law will turn some of our Democratic friends out of their places, but we are ready to abide by our declaration, for we do not believe that a Democrat is any better fitted to occupy his office for life than a Republican is.

We say that Republicans, Democrats, Populists, and all men in this country ought to hold their offices for a stated time; and at the expiration of that time they ought to be reappointed or somebody else ought to be commissioned in their place. When the people themselves are permitted to pass upon this question, that is the course they pursue. Nor do they end there. They do not merely ask if a man is honest and competent, but they ask also what is his politics.

And it is not sensible to say that those whom the people choose shall repudiate the course adopted by the people when they are permitted to choose in their primary capacity. You need not expect us to vote to modify this law for the purpose of displacing Democrats with Republicans. But if you will manifest your courage and show that you are sincere by bringing in a bill here to repeal this law, you will find the members on this side ready to join you in that practical and sensible course. [Applause.]

Mr. LOW. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House, the time for debate has expired.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments favorably to the House.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the gentleman will withhold that motion for a moment.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BINGHAM. I wish to know if the paragraph relating to the Civil Service Commission has been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair does not know.

Mr. MOODY. It has been read.

Mr. BINGHAM. It having been read, then I make my motion that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4751) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1899, and had directed him to report the same back with amendments and with the recommendation that as amended it do pass.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments; and pending that, I ask unanimous consent that authority be granted to members to print in the RECORD remarks on the question of the civil service.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent——

Mr. DINGLEY. For how long?

Mr. BINGHAM. For ten days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that permission be granted to members to print remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the civil service for the next ten days?

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, as the subject of the civil-service law is liable to come up later, I object.

Mr. BINGHAM. I beg pardon.

Mr. QUIGG. The subject of the civil-service law will come up later, and those of us who have not had an opportunity to speak will get it later.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to its passage.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold the demand for the previous question until I can ask unanimous consent on this side?

Mr. BINGHAM. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman withhold the demand for the previous question until I can ask unanimous consent of the House to consider an amendment that would place the mint at New Orleans in this bill on precisely the same footing as the mint at Carson City?

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the amendment that I send to the desk.

Mr. PAYNE. I trust the amendment will be reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to submit to the House the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 56, line 9, strike out all and substitute the following:

"Mint at New Orleans, La.: For superintendent, $3,500; assayer, melter and refiner, and coiner, at $2,500 each; cashier and chief clerk, at $2,000 each; assistant assayer, assistant melter and refiner, and assistant coiner, at $1,900 each; abstract clerk, bookkeeper, weigh clerk, and assayer's computation clerk, at $1,600 each; register of deposits, warrant clerk, and assistant weigh clerk, at $1,250 each; cashier's clerk, $1,100; in all, $31,950.

"For wages of workmen and adjusters, $74,000.

"For incidental and contingent expenses, including wastage of operative officers and loss on sale of sweeps, $25,000.

"And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to transfer from the mint at Philadelphia a part of the silver bullion now on storage at that institution to New Orleans for conversion into standard silver dollars."

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to reserve the point of order on the amendment until I can hear an explanation.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. This amendment simply gives the law as it is now.

Mr. DINGLEY. Was it estimated for by the Secretary of the Treasury as a necessary expense for the next fiscal year?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. This is just the salaries and those expenses of the mint that are carried in the existing law to-day.

Mr. MOODY. I should like to ask the gentleman from Louisiana if it is not a fact that the amount provided for in the amendment which he submits to the House is not contained in the estimate of the Department submitted to the committee? If I understand the question aright, this amount was not asked for by the Treasury Department at all.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that it is in the estimates, but it was not——

Mr. BINGHAM. I would say——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do not think the gentleman heard the statement of the gentleman from Louisiana. It was in the estimates before the committee.

Mr. MOODY. I did not so understand it; but I may be mistaken.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me to make a statement?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman from Louisiana has incorporated with the recommendation of the Director of the Mint this additional legislation:

And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to transfer from the mint at Philadelphia a part of the silver bullion now on storage at that institution to New Orleans for conversion into standard silver dollars.

That is entirely new.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand that the gentleman from Louisiana is entirely willing to strike that out.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman shall submit to the House a request for unanimous consent for the allowances as they are provided for to-day, but not for the introduction of any new legislation.

Mr. DOCKERY. But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Louisiana consents to strike that part from the amendment.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker. I ask unanimous consent that that portion of the amendment be stricken out. I do not consider it new legislation, but I am willing to waive it.

Mr. BARRETT. If the Speaker will submit the question for unanimous consent to the House, I think the matter can be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent?

Mr. BARRETT. I object.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRUMM. Would it be proper at this time to move to take a separate vote on the appropriation for the Civil Service Commission?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that no such vote has been taken in the committee.

Mr. DOCKERY. I will say further that no such proposition was submitted to the committee, notwithstanding the debate that has been had on the subject.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the demand of the gentleman from Pennsylvania for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. BAIRD. Let us have the amendments read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the amendments should be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendments.

Mr. DOCKERY. Has a separate vote been demanded on any of the amendments?

The SPEAKER. A separate vote has not been demanded on any of the amendments.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then I ask unanimous consent that the question be taken on the adoption of the amendments in gross.

The SPEAKER. Unless a separate vote is demanded, the question will be taken on the amendments in gross.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendments be dispensed with. They were well understood by the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the reading of the amendments be dispensed with? Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BINGHAM, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PAPER MONEY.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a request for unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill (H. R. 3333) to so change the national-bank act as to secure to the people in all sections of the country an equal opportunity to freely use paper money. The bill had been referred to a subcommittee and by that subcommittee reported to the full committee, and I am instructed to report the bill to the House and ask that it be printed as agreed upon and referred back to the committee. The supply has been exhausted and more will have to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, reports from that committee the bill H. R. 3333, and asks unanimous consent that the same be printed and recommitted. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported the bill (H. R. 6351) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri reserves all points of order.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LINNEY for three days, on account of important business.

SECOND-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I am informed at the document room that the supply of copies of the bill (H. R. 5359) to amend the postal laws relating to second-class matter, and the report, is entirely exhausted, and I ask for a reprint.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill H. R. 5359 and report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

ACTIVE OFFICERS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. CHANDLER. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report a resolution for which I ask immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to send to the Senate a statement showing the total number of active officers in the Navy on January 1, 1896; and further showing in each corps and each grade the total number and the number at sea, the number on shore duty, and the number on leave or waiting orders or on furlough.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not wish to object to the resolution, but I think it ought to be amended and extended so as to embrace those officers who have been retired.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state to the Senator that this information is wanted for a specific purpose. If the Senator will allow the resolution to pass, any resolution he may prepare in the direction which he indicates I will support.

Mr. ALLEN. It is not my intention to obstruct its passage at all, but I wanted to call attention to the fact that we have a vast army of competent officers who have been prematurely retired from the Navy, evidently for the express purpose of making places for young men who have just graduated or are about to graduate from the Naval Academy. Many of those retired are men of experience and in perfect health, fully competent to discharge the duties for which they were educated, and they are desirous of getting back into the service.

I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire, who has himself been Secretary of the Navy, and, let me say also, a very great credit to his party, and who is familiar with these matters, whether there is any purpose on the part of the Naval Committee to investigate this question and have those men restored to duty. I am seeking information of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator from Nebraska object to the resolution, I ask, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska object to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, no; I do not want to object to it at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope we may have action upon the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like, however, to have some information from the Senator, before the resolution is passed, as to the purpose of the committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. The committee want to know the present condition of the active list with reference to a proposition that is made to increase the Navy. We want to know, as to the active list, how many officers there were on the 1st day of January, 1898, how many were at sea, how many were on shore duty, and how many were on leave or waiting orders. We want that calculation made from the Naval Register of January 1, 1898, and just now and in that connection we do not want anything else. But if the Senator wants any other information I will support his resolution, if he will draw it. I will draw it up for him if he will indicate to me clearly what he wants.

Mr. ALLEN. I can not understand why the Senator from New Hampshire should decline to have his resolution embrace those who are not in active service, but are fit for active service.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no objection to that if the Senator will put it in another resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. And also some information as to why those men, a vast army of them, should be retired on half pay and not be upon the active list, when by that means the list of ineffective naval officers dependent on the Government is increased a hundred beyond any necessity.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator's speech could be added in a concise form as an amendment to the resolution, I would not object to it. But I hope he will now allow the resolution to pass, and give me the suggestions he has so well stated and I will put them in another resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. I will do so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution is before the Senate on the report of the committee. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MAP OF ALASKA.

Mr. LODGE. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 81) authorizing the Director of the Geological Survey to prepare a map of Alaska, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It authorizes the Director of the Geological Survey to prepare a map of Alaska showing all known topographic and geologic features, including what is known of the gold-bearing rocks and a descriptive text of the same, the text to contain also an explanation of the best known routes and methods of reaching the gold fields; 40,000 copies of the map and text to be printed, 10,000 for the use of the Senate, 20,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 10,000 for distribution by the Geological Survey. It also authorizes the Director to have the map and text prepared and printed in the engraving and printing division of the Geological Survey, and appropriates $2,500 for the purpose.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 12, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CORRECTION.

Mr. DOCKERY. Upon the yea-and-nay vote had yesterday in the House I am recorded as not voting. I was paired with the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. PITNEY; but by some oversight that fact does not appear in the RECORD.

BOUNDARY LINE BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to present from the Committee on Printing the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed as a document the report of the United States Boundary Commission, pursuant to the convention between the United States and Mexico, touching the re-marking of the boundary line between those two countries west of the Rio Grande; and, in addition thereto, 300 copies of said report for the use of the Department of State.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, this report was transmitted to Congress by the President on the 26th of April last, with a request that provision for printing be made. The resolution which has just been read was passed by the Senate at the first session of this Congress. It is not a privileged report, as I understand, but I trust there will be no objection to its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The consideration of the report at this time requires unanimous consent. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the concurrent resolution as read; which was adopted.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to call up for consideration House bill No. 6251, known as the urgent deficiency bill, which I reported yesterday. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House, under the five-minute rule, as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the bill which he calls up be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, under the five-minute rule. Is there objection? [A pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill (H. R. 6251) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, is this the first reading of the bill, or is it being read for amendment?

The SPEAKER. This is the first reading.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be now read by paragraphs for amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read the following:

Mints and assay offices: For freight on bullion and coin, by registered mail or otherwise, between mints and assay offices, $25,000.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a motion to strike out the provision just read; and I should like, if possible, to have more than five minutes in which to give my reasons for this motion. I should like to have twenty minutes, although I may not consume so much time.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed twenty minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL] asks unanimous consent to address the House for twenty minutes on the amendment proposed by himself. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, in the first place, I raise a point of order to this paragraph, the point of order being that it is new legislation.

The SPEAKER. There were no points of order reserved on the bill.

Mr. BELL. Then I will present my objections to the House in a motion to strike out. I was unavoidably absent, or I should have raised a point of order upon this provision, which reads:

For freight on bullion and coin, by registered mail or otherwise, between mints and assay offices, $25,000.

The next provision has not been read, but as I desire to discuss it in connection with this, I will read it:

That hereafter, in addition to the charges now imposed upon deposits of gold bullion at any of the assay offices or mints, the cost of transporting such bullion to the mints where the same is to be coined shall be collected from the depositor of the same.

Now, the point I want to make is this: That this Government almost indefinitely, or rather since there has been a great gold production, has paid the transportation charges from these assay offices established in different portions of the country to the mint to which the bullion is transported for coinage. For instance, this year in the city of Denver the Government purchased and melted $12,000,000 of gold bullion. Almost from time immemorial the Government has paid for this bullion at all assay offices of the United States. But this year Mr. Preston, of the Mint, has suggested that the producer of the bullion ought to pay the freight, and that hereafter such producers should pay for the gold produced not the mint price, but the mint price less the charge of transporting the bullion from the place of purchase to the mint itself.

Ordinarily that might seem to be a fair business principle; but as I understand, the Government establishes these mints for the purpose of coining the bullion into money for the benefit of the people at large, and therefore mints are or should be established, as far as possible, at or near the points where the ore is produced. But it has not done that. It has coined the most of the gold and silver of this country at the city of Philadelphia, and it has from time immemorial, almost, paid the coinage price of the gold at the office which it has established. At this time it has concluded it will change this, and now put the burden upon the men that produce the gold, and, as it claims, for this reason, that we are producing gold out in the Klondike and other far-away portions of the country, and the transportation charges are going to be very heavy.

It strikes me that when the Government of the United States said we will take this gold wherever we can find it, there was some good reason at the bottom of it. We wanted the gold for the purpose of getting it coined into United States money. We wanted it to furnish a circulating medium for the people, and therefore we have been since 1879, when our gold product began to amount to something, establishing offices wherever it was produced, and the Government purchased it against all other bidders and transported it to its mint and coined it into its money. Suppose you change that to-day. Men from Europe and men from the Orient can then go into Denver or Carson City or to any other assay office in the United States and buy these gold bars and transport them to the Bank of England it may be cheaper than they can transport them to New York City or Philadelphia.

That may seem strange to you who live around the ports of entry, but some of our merchants in the city of Denver tell us that there are numerous things that can be transported to that place from Europe cheaper than they can from New York or Philadelphia. It seems to me that this is an unjust move against the downtrodden miner of the West. Do you not believe that you have done about enough against his interest in the last few years? We have already had a move against silver, and now the move is started by the same forces against gold. This fight has never been between gold and silver; it is between any kind of Government money and the banks. This is the entering wedge, and I say to you that when you put another burden on gold, you simply put in the hands of foreigners a premium by which they can purchase your gold and run it into foreign mints. Why should we be burdened with this additional cost? Why has this Government made its appropriations every year from 1879 up to the present time? Because this Government wanted its own gold; this Government wanted a monopoly upon the gold for coinage purposes, for coining it into United States dollars.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BELL. Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Do you contend that the Government should favor the miner or the gold producer as against the wheat and cotton producer?

Mr. BELL. That does not touch my question. I want to say that the reason the Government has had its assay offices where the gold is produced is to have the first right to the purchase of the gold that it might be coined into United States dollars.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does not the miner sell his gold to the highest bidder there is in this country or any other?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. One question more. Do you believe in paternalism and making the United States the highest bidder in all cases?

Mr. BELL. I believe in a Government policy which will give the people of the United States as much money as they need, and in the most feasible way. We have tried this. We have tried to keep our gold at home. We have paid the premium on the fractional currency to keep it at home, and if there is any reason shown by this committee or by the Director of the Mint why this policy should be changed, I have not seen it.

The Director of the Mint is simply going on the same theory as our friend from Georgia—that there is no more reason that we should give a bonus to the gold miner than we should to the cotton grower. I agree with him. But the object of this law is not that. It is to give to the Government of the United States the first oppportunity to get the gold produced in the United States for its own purposes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then let me ask the gentleman one more question, and I will not again interrupt him. You admit that the Government pays more than the net value of the gold at the mints?

Mr. BELL. No, sir——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let me complete the question. The Government pays for the transportation of the gold as well as for the gold itself. Take the gold furnished at Denver or at Deadwood, and the Government pays for it there its value, and pays also for the cost of transportation. Now, we will probably establish an assay office in the Klondike region in time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, there is none there yet.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the Government pays not only the full value of the gold it purchases out there, but also pays the transportation of it to San Francisco or to Philadelphia, and has it minted at our cost, does not the gold cost more than it ought?

Mr. BELL. You have no assay office there at present, though I would be very glad to vote for one, if you presented a proposition of that kind——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BELL. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is it not cheaper for the Government of the United States to pay the freight on the gold to the mints than to sell its bonds that are worth 120 at 104 in order to get gold?

Mr. BELL. Unquestionably. And in answer to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON], I wish to say this in response to his inquiry: Why do you keep the mints in New Orleans and Philadelphia, where they have no gold and where they are not needed for minting purposes? Why not establish them where the gold is produced?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, they are building one now at Denver. That will be close enough.

Mr. BELL. Yes, they are; and they will be many years in building it, unless they increase their pace very materially. They have been a year or a year and a half merely drawing up the plans. That being the case, how soon will we probably get a building? There is no promise of it for years and years to come. And yet whenever gold is produced the owners may be forced to transport it to Philadelphia. I defy anyone to get it to New Orleans. He can not do it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, one other question growing out of the question propounded by the gentleman from Alabama. What difference would it make, in the judgment of the gentleman, when, even after you get it in the United States Treasury, it is taken out on silver certificates and sent abroad for speculation? Why do you want to hoard it——

Mr. BELL. Well, there are reasons—at least some: You say to these men in the Klondike region, "We want your custom; we want your trade." If we do not secure their gold it may go somewhere else, and the American market may lose this trade. I will venture that the Klondike trade would not come to America, when it could as well go elsewhere, if we did not purchase their gold. They are going to make their trade relations where they can secure the greatest advantage to themselves; and the men who purchase the gold at Klondike will be the ones from whom the miners will purchase their supplies. You should make an inducement not to send that gold abroad.

This is an innovation which has not been considered in the House. It is an emanation from the men who now want to force everybody to bring their gold to the mint at Philadelphia and at their own expense distribute the money in the Eastern States. We are tired of that policy. It seems to us that we have borne enough burdens for the East without forcing us to distribute their currency. It seems to me that it is time that we should have a little breathing spell in that part of the United States.

Now, in talking to officers of the Mint, the officials say to us that they have no interest in this matter; that it is our place to transport the bullion. It seems to me that if we produce all the gold, if we dig it from the hills and deliver it to the Government, then it is its duty to distribute it. It seems to me that if we dig the gold to produce a circulating medium of the country, we should not be forced to transport it after producing it for the convenience of the East.

There is another effect of this. We are required to produce the gold; then under this amendment the officials may force us to transport the gold here or there in the country to the place of distribution, according to the caprice of officers of the Mint.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Do you not agree that the single gold basis could not keep the gold here anyway?

Mr. SHAFROTH. But we ought to try and keep as much of it as we possibly can.

Mr. BELL. If you do not have gold, what are you to have? I want to say to you, my friend, the men that are putting this burden on gold care no more for gold than they do for silver. You will find that the same men will come here and insist that this House shall vote to issue bank notes. They will insist that this House shall vote to issue bonds, and let them draw interest, and go to this enormous expense to furnish this Government with a bank-note circulation. But when it comes to furnishing this Government with a gold circulation, or with a silver circulation, or with any kind of a money circulation that the banker does not toll, you find the cry going up from the same quarter. Now, wait until the banker's bill comes in. Wait until the bill for the issue of bank notes comes, and there will be no squeamishness about the collection of interest on bonds lying in the vaults.

You will find there is no question about taking the expense off from that kind of currency. No; the policy will be to take it off the banker and put it on the Government. And when you strike the minority, when you strike the few who are struggling in the hills, when you strike the people, then you find the war cry from this quarter is to take the burden off the Government. When you reach the paper currency, it will be, "take the burden off the banker and shoulder it on the people." Now, I believe that this provision ought to be beaten. I believe there ought to have been some good reason shown for this provision before putting it in this bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, the provision which is under discussion in this bill is that there shall be a charge upon the gold bullion produced in the United States for the shipment of the same from the assay offices to the mints to be coined. That, we contend, is a change of existing law. The law as it now exists provides that the United States shall pay for gold bullion at the assay offices the mint price thereof. The provision ought not under any consideration to be passed in an appropriation bill, although no point of order was reserved upon it.

Mr. Speaker, this question is more than one of paying freight or express charges. It is something that is deeper than the mere question whether the miner should pay an additional 1 or 2 cents on the dollar for freight. It means whether or not this country is going to encourage the production of gold, and it is the first step made by any Congress of the United States to attempt to discourage the production of it. Now, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] has asked, Why should gold be upon any different basis than agricultural products? It seems to me that it is very plain, and should be plain to him, since he believes in bimetallism.

Mr. Speaker, every believer in bimetallism contends that it is the quantity of primary money in the world that affects prices. Consequently, when a nation discourages the production of gold, or does not encourage it, that necessarily limits the quantity of gold produced, diminishes the amount of gold coined, and therefore produces a fall of prices. That is the argument that the gentleman makes upon the silver question, and it is the same argument exactly that he can legitimately make upon the question of discouraging the production of gold. He says, why should there be any difference between gold and agricultural products?

The difference is this: One is a measure of value, the other is a mere commodity. Every nation on earth has encouraged the production of gold. Why? Because the quantity of gold in the world, under a gold standard, must measure the value of everything else, and consequently everything that is raised in the field and on the farm has its price measured by this same gold. Therefore any bill that has a tendency to discourage the production of gold will inevitably affect the prices of the commodities which are produced in the State represented by the gentleman.

Now, Mr. Speaker, is it right, is it fair, when the Government of the United States has enacted that 23.2 grains of gold shall constitute a dollar and be the measure of values, that a different price for gold should exist in different parts of the same country? Should it not, in order to be fair to all its citizens, pay the same price at all its assay offices? Is it right that the producer of gold should be compelled to ship it to Philadelphia, 2,000 miles from the mines, there to have it coined, and then pay the freight on shipping it back where it is to be used as money? It is the duty of the Government to furnish a circulating medium. Is that fair? You can very easily see that if you are going to have a system of that kind you ought to have the mints located where the gold is produced.

When you say that you will change the existing law, that has been the law and policy of this Government for many years, it seems to me you are undertaking a thing that is dangerous. It is the entering wedge of a new policy. Having demonetized silver, this is a step in the direction of limiting the production of gold. Now, gentlemen may say that it can not affect very much. It may be more important than they think. We know that there are thousands of mines in the Western country that pay hardly more than the expenses of mining; the minute that you put an additional charge of some kind upon the product, that minute hundreds of these low-grade mines have got to close or else some ore that will pay them better must be found.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Neither does cotton production pay in the South.

Mr. SHAFROTH. We can not help that; but the more gold you get the greater the price of cotton, according to your own theory of money. This must be the result: If you have an increase in the quantity of primary money, you must of necessity decrease the demand made upon that money. When you decrease the demand you decrease the value of that money, and decreasing its value must increase the price of that which it will buy.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to agree upon some little time for the limitation of this debate. I want to get on with the bill. I would suggest twenty minutes, ten on each side.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important proposition now pending, probably more so than the gentleman from Illinois believes. I hope debate will not be limited just now.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I think we can agree. There has already been twenty-five minutes.

Mr. BLAND. I certainly would not agree to that. Better let the debate go on for an hour.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, there are several members on this side of the House who desire to speak on this subject.

Mr. BLAND. I say this is too important a proposition to hurry it through the House without debate.

Mr. KELLEY. We think it is an important measure and do not want to be cut off with ten minutes' debate on this side of the House.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I hope my colleague, the chairman of the committee, will let this debate run for some time.

Mr. CANNON. I want to do it, but if the majority of the House want to stop debate it can do it. But I want to see if we can not agree about the time. Say thirty minutes, fifteen on each side.

Mr. BLAND. Say two hours on a side. I will not make any agreement for less at this time. The policy of this proposition is a very important one.

Mr. KELLEY. Say thirty minutes on a side.

Mr. CANNON. Say thirty minutes on a side, then, as the gentleman has suggested.

Mr. BLAND. I will object to any agreement just now.

Mr. CANNON. Well, Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to be recognized for five minutes.

I want the attention of the House for the purpose of stating what I understand to be, and what I think I know to be, the condition after investigating the facts touching this proposed change of law. In 1879—not always, I will say to my friend from Colorado—the law provided that from that time gold might be received at any assay office at the mint price, and that is the law to-day. In other words, gold can be deposited at Deadwood, in Montana, in Colorado, or at any other assay office, and the owners of the gold can receive the mint price of the gold at Philadelphia, San Francisco, or such other mint as is minting gold.

What does that mean? Pure and simple, that the Government pays a man, anybody in private life, whether he be a Rothschild or a bloated plutocrat, who possesses the gold, and will pay it because the bloated plutocrat will have the gold, the mint price at the assay office, and will transport the bullion a thousand miles at its own cost. So that the Government after it has accepted this bullion at the mint price pays the transportation to the mint where it is to be coined. Now, that is the law. And in this very bill gentlemen will notice that they have exhausted the appropriation for this year. It is exhausted now, and they come and ask $20,000 more to pay these charges.

Now, the Government does construct assay offices. The Government donates the office building, donates the salaries of the officials to accommodate the producer of bullion. But it goes further, and pays a premium upon that bullion that equals exactly the cost of transportation to the point where the Government wants to coin it. Now, this Congress will not pass until an assay office is established on the Yukon, where there has been very considerable gold produced; and if this law remains as it is, when that assay office is established the Government will have to pay the San Francisco or Philadelphia Mint price, as it may happen to be coining gold at the time, for that bullion. Probably it will amount to 2 per cent; I do not know. But whatever it does amount to, it is a bounty of that much.

That has been the law since 1879. Now, in the opinion of your committee, I believe unanimously, with the exception of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL]—the opinion seemed to be clear that the law should be amended so that the producer of bullion, whether it was a mine that produced $10 by a day's work, by placer mining, or whether of the Treadwell Mining Company, that produces millions a year, they should do as everybody else does if they want to market their goods—pay the cost of transportation thereon.

But the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] says that the bullion ought to be coined where it is mined. Why is it not? In the first place, you can not put a mint at every mining place. They are building one at Denver, but it is not far enough along yet to coin money, but perhaps it may be further on. If built there, the transportation would have to be paid from the assay office where the bullion is purchased to that mint. They say, Why should it not be coined where it is mined, that it may circulate where it is mined? But there is a sparse population usually at the places where it is mined. The great population of this country is in the Mississippi Valley and on the Atlantic Coast. The principal coinage is at Philadelphia, because the principal demand for this product when coined is in this great Mississippi Valley and on the Atlantic Coast.

But the gentleman says you are going to discourage the gold mining operations when you repeal this bounty on its production. Let us be honest with each other. If a bounty of 1½ per cent on the production of gold is good, why is not 5 per cent better? If it is a good thing to pay a bounty on the production of one of the precious metals, why not pay a bounty on all other productions? This is a matter of great interest. Here is the gentleman who proceeds to talk about his money theories. I am not speaking disrespectfully of anybody. I have got money theories, not in harmony, perhaps, with many gentlemen on both sides of this House; but when we come to a plain business proposition like this, that has its feet planted in equity and justice, the Lord help the man that can not solve it without getting in his money theories, because he is very sure to run wild, and it does not make much difference which party he belongs to. It is worse than the hydrophobia.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, it is not true, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois, that all the members of the committee favor this change in the law. I had to attend the meeting of another committee in a matter of interest to my State, and was not present when this provision of the bill was voted upon, although I was present during the greater part of the discussion and my position was well understood. I do not believe the change ought to be made at this time. I do not hope to be able to satisfy those who do not believe that there is any difference between products and gold bullion, and yet I wish to offer a few observations based upon the idea that our basis of redemption money is now too small and should not be restricted.

It costs the Government something to transport the bullion from the assay office to the mint, but it has been the policy of the Government for twenty years to pay these charges in order to control all the gold bullion mined in this country. Why should we now discontinue this policy for the reason that it is going to cost a few thousand dollars? Is economy the only motive for this proposed legislation? It is said that because of the gold discoveries that have been made in Alaska it will cost considerably more than heretofore to transport the bullion, and that for this reason the change ought to be made. So far as that being an argument in favor of the change, it seems to me to be a very strong one against it.

If these mines produce what we are led to believe by the newspapers they will, we may expect in this country a large volume of gold bullion within the next two years. Until we can get the free coinage of silver we certainly need all we can possibly get, and I prefer to pay freight charges than to sell bonds to borrow. This policy, if it meant anything in the beginning, if it means anything now, is to get as much gold as possible to the American mints to coin into eagles, half eagles, and double eagles to be used as money for the people. The policy of this Government should be to get as much redemption money as possible, and with the mints closed against silver I think it wrong to remove any inducement to mint gold. It simply means this, that the Government says to every bullion holder who will deliver the same at any assay office in this country it will pay the coinage value. The Government can then mint it where it pleases, keep it as long as it pleases, but it all ought to be coined into American coins at once.

If this gold is to be produced in Alaska, as we hope and believe it will, and no opportunity is given to the courageous miner to transport it, no provision is made by this Government to take it, then what assurance have we that the gold that is mined on the American side of the Yukon will not go elsewhere than to our mint? It will beyond all question do so if other countries offer to pay the transportation charges from Alaska to the mints.

That seems to me to be all there is in the question. So far as I am concerned, I am not willing to destroy this statute, which has been in existence for twenty years, right on the eve of what is believed to be the greatest gold discovery in the last twenty-five years, simply because the mines are distant from the mints.

The great gold combine which controls the gold of the world and within the last three years has caused this Government to go to the auction block with thirty-year bonds to buy gold in order to maintain the gold reserve, has now, it is said, obtained control of the transportation companies, or seeks to get control of them; and if you now let them have the power to fix the transportation charges on the bullion from the mines to the mints, the most of which are in the East, they will fix the price of gold bullion. They do not want any more gold coined unless they own it. This will enable them to prevent it.

Mr. GAINES. At present does the owner of the gold bullion pay the freight to the mint?

Mr. McRAE. He does not. The Government takes it at the assay office.

Mr. GAINES. What is the change now proposed in the law?

Mr. McRAE. The change proposed is to make the owner of the bullion deliver it at the mint, or pay for it, while the law is to the effect that the assay office will take the gold at the mint value and transport it to any mint where its coinage may be desired. The present proposition is to change the law in that respect so as to make the bullion owner pay the cost of transportation from the assay office to the mint.

Mr. GAINES. That would drive the Yukon gold away?

Mr. McRAE. I think it would make it possible.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There are certain charges now.

Mr. McRAE. There are some charges, and these, I think, are entirely sufficient to protect the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I cordially approve the contemplated change in the present law providing for the coinage of gold. Up to 1879 the owner of gold ore bore the expense of transporting his ore to the mint, but since then, under the law enacted in that year, the Government not only coins gold ore at a charge not greater than the actual cost of mintage, but also pays the cost of transporting the ore from the assay office to the mint where coined. The clause which it is proposed to strike out changes the law, and while according mintage to gold ore as now and heretofore, it, if adopted, will require the owners of gold ore to pay the cost of transporting it from the assay office to the mint where it is to be coined into money.

I would like the gentlemen, Mr. Speaker, who are opposed to the change to give to the House a sound and just reason why the owner of gold ore should be kept on a better footing than the grower of wheat or cotton.

As the law now stands, the owner of the gold ore has his property converted into money, the Government paying the expense of its transportation from the assay office to the mint and then converting it into current coin at a cost to the owner not greater than the actual expense of the mintage; but the owner of the bale of cotton or the bushel of wheat must himself pay all the cost of transportation from the field where it is grown to the place where it may be converted into money.

When gentlemen vote to allow the great corporations and syndicates, who own and control almost all of the gold mines of the West, free transportation of their ore from the assay offices to the mints where it is coined into money, at a charge not greater than the actual expense of mintage, what would they say to their constituents who grow cotton and wheat if they should ask that the Government shall also provide free transportation for their products from the fields where they are grown to the places where they are converted into money?

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman allow me a question right there?

Mr. SAYERS. Not now. I have but a short time. The gentleman can answer in his own time.

Mr. Speaker, what the people of this country are most complaining of is that the burdens of Government are not equally and fairly distributed and that there is too much class legislation. And is not the law which provides that the owner of gold ore may transport his property from the assay office to the mint, however distant the two places may be apart, at the expense of the Government a most striking illustration of class legislation?

Is it just to the people that the money paid by them under a system of unequal and burdensome taxation into the Treasury shall be expended to increase the profits of the syndicates and corporations that operate the gold mines of the West?

Who are they, Mr. Speaker, who constitute these syndicates and who own the stock issued by these corporations? Where do they live? In the great cities of the country and in Europe, receiving large dividends from the operations of their mines, made more valuable because of this special advantage given them by this Government.

The men who dig and toil in the mines upon wages do not derive any benefit from this legislation. The stockholders and the speculators, they who buy and sell in Wall street and in similar places, are the beneficiaries of the free transportation given to their property by the Government. But, Mr. Speaker, it is contended that if the owners of gold ore are required to transport their product from the assay offices to the mints at their own cost the production of gold will for that reason decline. I am surprised, sir, that such a proposition should be presented to this House.

Can it be seriously contended by anyone who has reflected, even for a moment, upon the subject that such a result would follow? Can anyone believe that there will be an ounce less of gold ore dug out of the mines or removed from its place of deposit by nature, or taken to the mints for coinage because of the fact that the owners of the ore shall be required, as prior to 1879, to bear the expense of its transportation? One can hardly consider such a proposition as made except in jest.

But my friend from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] says that if the pending proposition be adopted the gold ore in the West and in Alaska will pass by the mints of our own country and go to those of Europe. Can this be true? In no other country is the transportation of gold ore and its mintage given free to the owner, or rather borne by the Government. If so, where is the inducement for the owner of American gold ore to transport it across the ocean to foreign mints, 4,000 miles distant from our Eastern border? The mere statement of the proposition carries its own refutation.

The syndicates and corporations who own and work the gold mines of the West are realizing, we are told, handsome dividends from their investments. They do not stand upon the same level with the producers of cotton, who sell their product at the nearest railway depot for 4¼ and 5 cents per pound; and yet the farmer is subjected to the cost of transporting his cotton to the markets of the world, while his Government provides for the transportation of the gold ore of the mine owner, at the expense of the public Treasury, to the place where it is to be converted into money. The proposition, Mr. Speaker, is, in my judgment, absolutely indefensible from the standpoint of the principle involved in the declaration of equal rights to all and special privileges to none.

But, sir, it has been said during the course of this debate that it is to the interest of the Government to foster this industry. To "foster" it—that is the language used. These words ought not to fall very pleasantly upon Democratic ears. Bounty to men who already enjoy large fortunes acquired in a brief space of time. The value of the bounty, say some gentlemen, must not be impaired by putting its beneficiaries upon an exact level with their countrymen.

Mr. Speaker, the party to which I belong has declared in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, and in so doing it meets with my hearty concurrence. That declaration means this and nothing more: That our mints shall be open for the coinage of both metals alike. It does not mean that the money of the people, wrung from them by hard and unequal taxation, shall be also expended to pay the cost of the transportation of the gold ore of the owner from the assay offices to the mints, thereby and to that extent enhancing the value of the mine. It is enough that the mints shall be always open to him and that his ore may be coined into money at a charge not greater than what it costs the Government.

Mr. GAINES. Do foreign countries pay freight in this way on bullion transported?

Mr. SAYERS. My understanding is that they do not under similar circumstances.

A MEMBER. No government does so.

Mr. SAYERS. The law which is sought to be repealed crept into the statute book at a time when the Democrats were in a minority in this body. If it should be continued in force, it will cost the Government during the present fiscal year not less than $40,000, all paid to express companies. How much it has cost in the past or it will cost in the future I am unable to say.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. According to your theory, do you believe that the Government ought to mint free of charge the gold for any man? Would that not be giving an additional bounty or privilege to this class of men that could not be given to the rest of the community?

Mr. SAYERS. I will give you my opinion precisely on the point. I believe that all men in this country, rich or poor, high or low, whatever their occupation, ought to stand upon exactly the same footing under the law. If this is a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, there ought not to be any discrimination in behalf of any man or of any interest.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Do you believe the Government ought to make a charge for minting the gold for anybody?

Mr. SAYERS. I do, to the extent of paying the actual expense of the coinage, but no more. It does that now.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am absolutely astonished at the position taken both by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], that they make comparisons between the production of gold and the agricultural products of this country. It is well known that every product of human industry is affected to a greater or less extent by the production of gold. It is well known to the gentleman from Texas that we are now practically upon a gold standard. It matters not how many different kinds of money you have in circulation in the United States at the present time; every dollar of it represents the purchasing power of the gold dollar. And if by any act, if by any legislation, you make gold scarce, you make it dear, and necessarily increase the purchasing power of every gold dollar and thereby reduce the price of every product, either of the farms or the mills, throughout the length and breadth of this land.

I wish to call the attention of gentlemen on the floor of the House to the fact that you have but three ways of obtaining gold in order to have a medium of exchange and to enable you to transact the business of the country. You have either got to dig it out of the bowels of the earth, obtain it for our products sold abroad, or issue bonds in exchange for it. You have no other way by which it can be obtained.

I call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that within the past four years $262,000,000 of bonds have been issued to obtain the gold necessary to enable the Government to transact its business. Recognizing this fact even before the demonetization of silver took place, the Government placed on the statute books of the land laws putting a practical premium on the mining of gold; and now the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] says that "if it is a good thing to put a premium of 1 per cent, why not put a premium of 5 per cent?" I reply that it would be a wise policy to put a premium of 5 per cent rather than to issue another batch of Government bonds, as was done under Mr. Cleveland's last Administration.

Now, it is perfectly apparent that the country is on a gold standard, and that it is the purpose of the Republican party to hold it there. This being so, I wish to know why it is that that party is not satisfied with holding it upon that gold standard, but would at the same time institute new kinds of legislation that will, if enacted, cause even a greater scarcity of gold? Why, sir, if you enact this law prohibiting or destroying the slight advantage given to the miner of gold it would result in diverting a very large amount that now finds its way to our mints across the water. It is well known that there are over $6,000,000 worth of gold produced annually in the Black Hills. What amount of that has gone into the American mints? Not more than one-half. The other goes abroad to the coffers of the Rothschilds. But, you say, they have to pay the freight if they get the gold. Go to the office of J. Pierpont Morgan in New York and you will find who pays the freight. You will find that the Rothschilds practically own all of the great railroads in the United States, and they have free transportation here.

Why, gentlemen, this is a question that affects every man, woman, and child in the United States of America, and I say that I have no more regard for those engaged in the mining of gold than

I have for the man engaged in the production of wheat, oats, or cattle; but I do know this—that the gold mined and brought to the mints of the United States affects every person in the land, and it is for their welfare that I am considering this proposition, and not in the interest of the gold miner alone. Why, sir, if you enact this clause that has crept in here almost surreptitiously, how do you expect to get your due proportion of gold from the Klondike? I say it should be in the interest of every member of the Republican party by all means to give us all the gold you possibly can, at least so long as you hold us upon the gold standard. Recollect, gentlemen of this House, that you have now got in the world, according to the report of the Director of the Mint, only $2.51 per capita of gold and $2.58 per capita of silver, or $5.09 per capita of both. You have stricken silver down as the money of final redemption, and now you propose to lessen, by all means within your power, the production of gold.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, neither bimetallism nor monometallism, nor the volume of the money in this country, is affected one way or the other by this proposition, and can not be. Now, the whole gist of this question is simply this: Since 1879 the Government has been transporting gold from the assay offices to its mints, paying the transportation. The great bulk of the gold that is mined in this country or in any other country does not rest in the hands of the man who digs it. It stops in the hands of the merchant, the speculator, the banker. These men are now sending their gold to our assay offices, having it assayed and its value fixed, and the Government absolutely taking it there and paying for its transportation to the mint. Now, Mr. Speaker, if we were put to a disadvantage in competing with Europe for gold, and with Asia and with Africa, there might be something in the position taken by gentlemen on the other side. But when the gentleman who preceded me stated that the United States Government is likely to lose the gold from the Klondike or from Colorado or from any other section of our country, and that it is likely to go to Europe because we do not pay the freight on it, that is a monstrous proposition.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Wait a moment. It is a monstrous proposition, as gentlemen ought to see at a glance. What is the difference between the transportation from Denver or from Deadwood to Philadelphia and from Denver or Deadwood to London or to China or to Japan? More than ten times the amount of transportation charges would have to be paid on that gold. Do you suppose the banker or the speculator in Deadwood is fool enough to ship his gold to Africa or to Japan or to Europe and to pay the transportation on it, and there take the same price that this Government would have given him at the mints? Not at all.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Is there any evidence as to the difference in cost of freight?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to say this once for all, that there is not a government under the broad heavens that pays the transportation on gold bullion to its mints. If it is minted with the English stamp, if it becomes an English coin, they must transport it from Deadwood or from the assay office in this country clear over to their mint, and there it is coined and stamped, and they must pay the transportation on it. Therefore they are not competing with the United States Government in this matter.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question now?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I have only five minutes.

Mr. KELLEY. One word. You say it is a monstrous proposition that gold should go abroad for the reason I have stated. But it is not a theory or a proposition, but it is a fact which exists. Half the amount of gold produced in the Black Hills has gone abroad——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman is simply mistaken. It does not do any such thing for the reason given, for this Government now pays transportation charges.

Mr. KELLEY. What is your authority for that statement?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, if we intend by this provision of paternalism to help the speculators in gold dust and gold bullion—men who buy it from the miners and send it to the mints—then, as my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], well says, what excuse can you give to the raisers of cotton and wheat when you go home and they tell you they have had to take the cotton price in Liverpool and pay all expenses, not only of transportation, but other expenses, and have been compelled to sell cotton below the cost of production?

And yet the man who goes to Colorado and digs gold dust sells it on the streets to the merchant. That merchant sends it to the assay office at Denver, and the Government pays the transportation. What answer are you to give to the wheat and cotton men?

But, Mr. Speaker, there is a "nigger in the woodpile" in this thing—this little bit of protest of the West against the East. I want to say to you Western men that the Committee on Appropriations never for one moment thought or suspicioned that there was any advantage being given to the East over the West in this matter. It is not in it. I am not one of those men who sympathize with Philadelphia or the East particularly. If I have any personal sympathy, as a Southern man it is with the West, and my past political life has indicated that. There is nothing in this claim as to the relative volume of currency or the amount of gold that we may receive under the one or may not receive under the other arrangement.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, my friend the honorable chairman of the committee was in error in the statement that the committee was unanimous in reporting this proposition with the exception of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL]. I have a distinct recollection of reserving the right in open committee to oppose this proposition. I did so at the time because I had not had an opportunity to investigate it. It came to the committee, as I understand, with the recommendation solely of the Director of the Mint. The case might have been strengthened had the indorsement of the Secretary of the Treasury also been given.

But, Mr. Speaker, I can not support the proposition to strike out this paragraph on the grounds stated by the gentleman from Colorado. I shall support it, but not in the interest of any class of people in this country, even though they be worthy, as the gold miners of Colorado are. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] asked why any difference should be made in respect to the production of gold and the production of cotton and corn. It seems to me that the distinction is obvious. Gold is not simply a mere commodity. If it was, then the able argument used by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] would be unanswerable. But gold is more than a commodity. It represents more than cotton, more than corn, and more than wheat, or any other article of commerce. Gold, as the only money of redemption in this country, under a gold standard, largely measures values. It is subject to the law of supply and demand, and values are therefore largely determined by the volume of gold in circulation. That being the case, it seems to be properly the policy of the Government to contribute so far as it may be wise to increase the production of gold in the United States.

Mr. CANNON. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. There was as much gold, or substantially, twelve months ago as there is now. Twelve months ago wheat was worth 50 or 55 cents a bushel. Now it is worth 90 cents to a dollar. Now, if gold is a mere measure of value, will the gentleman explain the difference in the price of wheat?

Mr. DOCKERY. If the gentleman will refer to the reporters' notes he will observe that I never made that statement, or, at least, did not intend to do so. Gold, as everything else, is subject to the law of supply and demand. Wheat is also subject to the same law under any standard. I do not care whether the standard be silver or gold, it comes within the limitations of the law of supply and demand in ascertaining its value. If there is famine abroad and an abundance here, necessarily wheat goes up in price, the demand exceeding the supply.

But the whole contention, the whole argument, revolves around the proposition that the standard of value itself is subject to the law of supply and demand. Now, Mr. Speaker, if gold is not subject to this unchangeable law, then it is the only thing under the sun that is not; but in my view it is responsive to this law. That being true, values are largely determined by the volume of gold in circulation. It follows logically, then, that the Government can come in, as it has since 1879, to facilitate or to foster, if I might use the word, the production of gold in the United States, because it is not only, as I stated, a commodity, but it measures values, subject to this economic law which has existed from the beginning.

Mr. SAYERS. Will my colleague permit a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. I will hear my colleague.

Mr. SAYERS. Does my colleague insist upon the proposition that it is right for this Government to stimulate any production under process of taxation or governmental expenditure?

Mr. DOCKERY. I would not desire to commit myself to that proposition without limitation. I am trying now to indicate a limitation, and thought that I had stated the proposition so clearly that my able friend from Texas had grasped it. I said a moment ago that gold was not a mere commodity, but something more than a commodity. It is money, and largely determines all other values, under a gold standard, and therefore my desire that the Government aid at least to the extent that it has since 1879, when the law was enacted which is now sought to be repealed by the pending paragraph.

The question may not be free from doubt, but coming only with the sanction of the Director of the Mint, so far as official recommendation is involved, I am not willing at this time to give my vote to the proposition for a reversal of the policy of the Government which has been maintained since 1879.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I would like ten minutes.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri be allowed to proceed for ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri be allowed to address the House for ten minutes. Is there any objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the argument of my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and others upon this question, but they are proceeding upon a wrong theory. They are assuming that gold is simply a commodity, like wheat and other things. Gold is given a monopoly at the mint by this Government, and is treated as the standard of all values in this country. Wheat is not, neither is corn, nor any other commodity; gold has the first privilege at our mint. My friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] might as well say that we who advocate the restoration of silver here advocate class legislation, because it would stimulate the production and use of that metal. When we come to the money metals we get out of the domain of commodity; we are touching a great question—the question that goes to the vitals of the commerce of this country.

My friend from Illinois referred to the fact that this law of 1879 was probably the first in our history that required the Government to pay the expense of transportation of gold bullion from the assay office to the mint. Why was that law enacted in 1879? The gentleman did not answer that. There was another law in force in 1879. When the resumption act was passed it provided for the resumption of specie payment in 1879, and as a means for that resumption, among other things, the sale of bonds to procure the gold for resumption purposes, and somewhere near $100,000,000 of bonds were sold to get gold to put into the Treasury for that purpose. Another law looking to the same result was enacted, and that was to secure gold by paying the transportation charges from the assay office to the mints of the Government.

Here were two acts looking toward the obtaining of a supply of gold for resumption purposes. Now, if my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will join with me in voting to repeal the law that provided for a sale of bonds to get gold for resumption purposes, I will vote for his proposition here; but until he does that, I insist, as was said by the gentleman from Alabama, that it is cheaper and better for the people to give facilities for getting our own gold to our mints than it is to sell bonds to get the gold. If you repeal a part of the means for resumption, why not the whole of it? Especially let us not repeal that part of it that has been maintained as long as the gold standard has been maintained in this country. What will be the effect of this? I predict that if this law passes changing the existing law the Philadelphia Mint will get all the gold for coinage, and instead of the Government depositing it in the mint most convenient to it and paying the transportation charges, it will, under the provisions of this bill, all go to the Philadelphia Mint at the expense of the producers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not in the interest of any gold miner or of any silver miner as such, nor am I in the interest of the great monopolists or corporations that may own some gold mine or some silver mine. As a rule, corporations that may own these mines or other mining interests, gentlemen who have been referred to as the Rothschilds, etc., have a way of obtaining cheap transportation of their own. They have a way of getting discriminations for themselves not only for their bullion, but all other products are transported cheaper for them than for the great mass of the people. It is the man that has not these facilities for transportation, it is the miner that owns the mine and can not get his bullion transported as cheaply as the monopolist, that we are here in the interest of, the poor man whose mine is simply paying him the expense of its operation, or a little more. If you put the further expense upon that operation and its products, you will probably close down all such gold mines in this country.

Now, sir, I have no doubt that the time is fast approaching when a reversal of trade will take place, when crops abroad will furnish the people there with their breadstuffs, when the balance of trade will be against us and gold will begin to depart from the Federal Treasury, when bond sales will have to take place under this resumption act. This provision is in the interest of bond sales in order to procure gold.

Mr. Speaker, this Government is the only one on earth where the public Treasury can be plundered at will by demands for gold. The Bank of England has a way of preventing her gold from being exported. It can raise the rate of discount. There a tax is put upon the export gold from Great Britain by the Bank of England. But here we can not do that. We are at the mercy of the gold plunderers of the world. Here we are met with the proposition to discourage the mining of gold in this country and to discourage the bringing of it to the mints and to our own Treasury.

Mr. GAINES. A few weeks ago the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] said that the people in the gold regions of the Klondike had "barrels of gold bullion" without a cent to buy food, and had no transportation. Congress immediately ordered the purchase of reindeer for their free use and transportation, and they are now being sent to the Klondike along with food. Now, why deprive these new pensioners of the Government of the free right of hauling their bullion to our own mints? Why free; why give them transportation in one thing and not the other, that is, as to their bullion, when by allowing the bullion transportation free they would soon cease probably to be paupers or pensioners on our hands and the Government. How can they pay for freight when there are no freight carriers there? Are we not blowing hot and blowing cold?

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, as I said in the beginning, this provision changes existing law and ought not to be in this bill. Since 1879 our mints have been open to the free coinage of gold, and no matter where the gold was produced—whether in Australia or on the Klondike or anywhere else—if it came to our assay offices and was assayed, it had free transportation to the mints of our Government. If gold is mined in the Klondike and brought to a Government assay office, I say let it come; it then becomes a part and parcel of the wealth of this country; and when it comes to our assay offices and is assayed, should or should not the owner pay the cost of transporting it to our mints to be coined and put into circulation in our own country, instead of going elsewhere to be put in circulation? That is the whole question. The question is whether or not we are to sell bonds for gold or whether we are to stimulate the production of gold in our own country; whether we are to afford facilities and inducements to keep the gold at home—to invite its production and coinage here in all possible ways without the sale of bonds.

I apprehend the advocates of this measure would not go with me to repeal that part of the resumption law which authorizes the sale of bonds. Yet here they are seeking to repeal that means of resumption that costs less to the people of this country to maintain the gold standard than any other part of our law.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there was a reason for the law of 1879, and I have tried to explain the reason. The statesmen who enacted that law had in view the hoarding of gold in the Federal Treasury and the maintenance of gold in the circulation of this country. They offered these inducements, I suppose, in order to prevent bond sales as far as possible. Why, then, repeal that law now? The fact that we may have sufficient gold in the Treasury to-day is no reason for assuming that it will be there to-morrow or next day.

I shall certainly oppose this proposition on the broad ground that so long as gold is maintained as the single standard of this country, it is public policy to procure it from the mines of this country and elsewhere by facilitating its coinage at the mints, instead of issuing bonds for the purchase of gold. If we had unlimited coinage of silver as well as gold, giving us, as we had prior to the resumption act and prior to the legislation of 1873, two sources of monetary supply (the mints being open to the free coinage of both metals), we might then, without being compelled to issue bonds to procure coin for resumption purposes, have a sufficient source of supply of gold and silver. We might then tax these products at the mints, or tax their transportation. But we are not in that condition. We are limited to gold and only gold for resumption purposes; and we have on our books a statute authorizing the sale of bonds for that purpose, against which I protest. I insist, therefore, that this amendment of the law should be stricken out.

Mr. CANNON. I should be glad to have a vote on this proposition. If there is nobody desiring further time——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to say a few words.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. So should I.

Mr. CANNON. I ask that this debate be closed in fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that debate on this proposition be closed in fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will not object if I can be recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. In regard to recognition, the gentleman, of course, would have to confer with the Speaker. If I had the power to recognize the gentleman, I would do so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to have five minutes more on this proposition.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the Speaker that I am quite content the gentlemen on the other side should have ten minutes, and that five minutes be allowed on our side; and I should be glad to have those five minutes to close the debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I withdrew my objection. I will take my chances on getting five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON].

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this section of the pending bill. I listened to the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], in which he said that under present conditions the Rothschilds and other purchasers of gold were driven out of the market because the Government had a monopoly on it, and because it paid the freight. Now that would be with me the strongest argument for maintaining the present conditions. This Government has, I believe, entered into obligations—perhaps in some cases by arbitrary decisions of the Treasury Department—to pay its indebtedness in gold. Therefore it is to our interest to keep all the gold in this country that we can; and anything which tends to give the Government a monopoly in this respect is, I believe, good policy.

I am somewhat surprised at the position taken here by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON]. I fear that the gold-standard people on that committee have hypnotized them. How any man who believes in the free coinage of gold and silver can make the argument that they have made I can not understand. I hope they will change their views before we come to a vote. The plea, of course, is that this proposition is in the interest of economy—is a saving to the taxpayers—and the plea is made that the present law puts the agricultural community at a disadvantage, inasmuch as the Government does not pay the freight on their products. But, as the gentleman from Missouri has well said, gold occupies an entirely different position from these other products.

The money function given to gold exempts it to a large extent from any comparison with the commodities produced on our farms. The money function given to gold creates that demand for it which otherwise would not exist; and inasmuch as it is to-day the sole money of redemption, which must of necessity fix the price of all products, we ought in our legislation to look to increasing the supply of gold. Inasmuch as these gentlemen have brought us to a single gold standard, they are under obligations to do what they can to increase the supply of that metal, because under any conditions, no matter how much encouragement may be extended, the supply of gold must be inadequate to meet the demand for currency to carry on the ever-increasing volume of business in this country.

Mr. Speaker, I am for any legislation that will encourage the output of gold, and I will go even further than some of my Republican friends. I would add to the proposition the free coinage also of silver to enlarge the supply of the money of the country, and I would supplement it with enough paper to make the supply adequate to the demand.

Now, gentlemen interested in this matter, gentlemen who are interested in the prosperity of the country, I ask you why you do not bring in a measure to make any man who gets silver coin transported or gold coin transported to the banks out West pay for the transportation. Why not bring in a bill to stop the practice of shipping silver or gold coin to the banks free of charge?

That is a drain upon the taxpayer. To-day if the banker wants $10,000 in silver sent to my city, it is sent to him, delivered there at the expense of the Government. We are always recognizing the interests of the banker and the money changer, but when anything comes up that you want to defeat you always appeal to the farmer, and tell us how he has been imposed upon. Is this an imposition upon him? Should he be made to pay this transportation? You people that are the self-appointed, ever-present probate court, looking after the interest of the farmers, I ask if this is justice. It is strange that the farmer has gotten into the condition in which we find him with these self-appointed guardians always looking after him and his interest as they have been doing.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any time in the history of this great country where any party has ever come before Congress with the proposition that they wanted to reduce the amount of coin that is used as money in circulation throughout the country. I do know of an instance in the past history of the country when the old United States Bank was in existence and the national-bank notes were circulating. This bank having issued these notes to circulate as money among the people of the United States, they sought to control absolutely the currency of the country, thereby giving them control of the people themselves. I know at that time history tells us that they bought up the gold and silver coin of America and shipped it out of the country to Europe, in order that they might have the only money in circulation themselves and that their bank notes might be the only money used by the people.

And to-day, when we see the only propositions that have been offered for the relief of the people of the country by the Republican party, so far as the currency is concerned, amounting simply to the proposition that you would give greater powers to the national banks of the country, and when we find that there is no effort made to increase the metallic coin of the country, but, on the contrary, to put the power to issue the money of the United States in the hands of a few men and a few bankers throughout the country, we find it to be in keeping with the history of the owners and controllers of the old national bank; that you want once more to eliminate the coin money of the people and prevent the mine owner and the bullion owner from enjoying the privilege of freely carrying his gold or silver to the mint and having it coined for his use.

Mr. Speaker, that was a right granted to the English-speaking people of the world as far back as the reign of Queen Anne, when she surrendered her right to the mines of her realm and gave that privilege to our forefathers. It was in keeping with the right that the Republican party has always given special privileges to the mining class. So far as the history of this country shows, the legislation of the Republican party, as well as the Democratic party, up to this good hour, has always been for the miner, in order to allow him to get as much gold and silver out of the hills for circulation as money as possible. There has never been a period when these special privileges have not been accorded to him. Why, in the last Congress of the United States, you, by your report from the Committee on the Public Lands, controlled by the Republican members of this House, brought in a bill authorizing the opening of the forest reservations to the miners. You did not open these reservations to the farmers.

There are in these forest reservations great tracts of fertile lands, magnificent regions where the citizens of the United States engaged in agriculture might go and make money and prosper. You have not opened these lands for that class of men, but you have opened them to the men who went into the hills to mine the gold and the silver. Why have you done this? Because you properly recognized the fact that the men who mine gold and silver perform a different function, occupy a different situation in respect to the Government, from those who raise grain or raise cotton.

I must confess my utter surprise at the position taken by my friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS]. He says that the Government should not become paternal; that we should not go on and foster the mining interests of the country. We have been told that they should stand on the same footing with the agriculturists. But I want to call my friend's attention to this proposition, which seems to have escaped his observation: The Government of the United States is not in the farming business; it is not engaged in raising corn or cotton, nor is it engaged in manufacturing cotton goods.

But under the Constitution of the United States the Government is in the coinage business, and is especially charged with the duty of providing sufficient coin money for the use of the people, just as much as it is its duty to provide an army and navy for public defense. Then the real question is, Will it not be much cheaper in the end to get the gold by paying the freight to the mint, rather than purchase it by issuing bonds at a great sacrifice to the Government and the people? I think so, and therefore shall vote against this change in the law.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Can not the gentleman from Illinois give me five minutes?

Mr. CANNON. There are but five minutes remaining, and we have occupied but fifteen minutes upon this side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me there can not be much said that is new that properly relates to this question. I have listened with great respect, as I always do, to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL], the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON], and I thought while they were talking upon this proposition that it was as true to-day as it was away back in ancient times that "words darken counsel." They shed no light upon the merits of this question as they fell from the lips of these gentlemen.

Now, in concluding this short debate, let us see what there is at issue. I will state it again. It is not a question as to where the gold shall go, whether it shall go abroad or stay in this country. It stays in this country or goes abroad, as the wheat and all other products stay in this country or go abroad, according to the demand. Why, our friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] talked in a way that would make you suppose that if this premium upon gold or its value produced in the mine was not paid, that the gold would go abroad, that the plutocrats of the Old World would just come in here and gobble it, hands down. Now, mark how plain a tale shall put that down. Take Montana, where the Treadwell mine produces millions of dollars' worth of gold every year.

Under the law as it now is, the Treadwell mine owners take their gold to the United States assay office, maintained at the expense of the United States, and then the Treadwell mine owners say to the United States, under the law, "For this million dollars' worth of gold pay me the value at San Francisco or at the Philadelphia Mint," and Uncle Sam pays it. Now, what does it cost Uncle Sam to pay it? The gold can not be coined at the Treadwell mine. If it was coined there, there would be no demand for it as coined. Uncle Sam pays the transportation charges on that million dollars' worth of gold to the mint at Philadelphia or the mint at New Orleans or the mint at San Francisco, and the public Treasury, your money and mine, loses just that amount. Now, if it is to be coined, it will go to the mint in either event, whether Uncle Sam pays it or whether he does not pay it. That will not make a particle of difference.

Now, let us get it to the mint and get it coined. What then happens? It will stay in this country just as long as it is more valuable here than it is abroad. The moment it is more valuable abroad, it goes there. Now, gold is more valuable here than it is abroad, and it is coming here. That is all there is of it. This is a plain business proposition; and when we propose to repeal that law, gentlemen at once see spooks and spirits. They call them from the vasty deep. They declaim, they warn the people about what? An imaginary ill, based upon imaginary misstatements of facts. And then, having thrown the patient into fits, they have been the devil on fits for twenty years and still are. [Laughter.] Now, I ask this House to follow the recommendation of the Director of the Mint, to follow a plain business proposition about which there is no politics, and to vote down the proposition to strike out this provision, made by the gentleman from Colorado. I think that is the wise thing to do.

Mr. GREENE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. GREENE. If the mints are compelled to pay the freight on the gold, that affects the profits of the miner, does it not?

Mr. CANNON. Precisely, just that much.

Mr. GREENE. And inasmuch as you affect the profits of the miner, you affect the production of gold?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; the miner gets about 1 per cent less. Let us say it is 1 per cent less.

Mr. GREENE. Now, if you lessen the production of gold in this country, then you are lessening the circulating medium, and by every law of political economy lowering prices, are you not?

Mr. CANNON. Does my friend think that 1 per cent will shut up the gold mines?

A MEMBER. Some of them.

Mr. GREENE. Suppose a mine is just paying now, and you lay upon it the burden of paying for transportation from Colorado to Philadelphia. Would you not close it?

Mr. CANNON. Just paying now! Why, everybody understands that the most prosperous section of this country to-day is in the State of the gentleman from Colorado. Now, I am glad of that, and I am willing that it should be so, but I do not want to tax the balance of the people to pay this premium. If it is a good thing to pay 1 per cent premium, then it is better to pay 2, 3, 5, or 10 per cent. The gentleman from South Dakota confesses it.

Mr. GREENE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. I have but one minute.

Mr. GREENE. Just one short question. Is it not the duty of the Government to furnish money to the people—to see that the people have a circulating medium?

Mr. CANNON. No.

Mr. GREENE. Then our statesmen were mistaken in the past.

Mr. CANNON. It is the duty of the Government to leave each citizen of the country free to work out his own salvation, so far as it is possible to do so, and carry on the Government by taxing him.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Except the manufacturer.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). Simply and purely that, and nothing more, I will say to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Colorado to strike out as the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 4, 5, 6 of page 4 of the bill.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BELL. I would like to ask that the next paragraph be considered as under consideration with this. We did not read the two paragraphs.

Mr. CANNON. Well, it was understood that debate should relate to the two paragraphs. The gentleman moves to strike them both out.

Mr. BELL. That was the understanding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to strike out the two paragraphs.

Mr. BELL. Now, what I move is to strike out the second paragraph. We did not have it read before.

Mr. CANNON. That is what the gentleman's motion was, and I am quite content.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mints and assay offices: For freight on bullion and coin, by registered mail or otherwise, between mints and assay offices, $25,000.

That hereafter, in addition to the charges now imposed upon deposits of gold bullion at any of the assay offices or mints, the cost of transporting such bullion to the mints where the same is to be coined shall be collected from the depositor of the same.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Clerk has read the first part, lines 4, 5, and 6, and he has also read the second part, which are the lines following that.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to strike out the second part, is it not?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BELL. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 59; noes 65.

Mr. BELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 110, nays 125, not voting 121; as follows:

For the fiscal year 1898, $20,646.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word of that paragraph.

There has been so much said in this debate, Mr. Speaker, concerning the predictions in regard to the probable effect of coinage legislation that I venture to remind the House of some predictions which the older members, especially including the distinguished gentleman who has charge of this bill, have listened to in this Hall. When the Bland-Allison Act was under consideration every man who spoke opposing that measure asserted that the immediate effect of the passage of that bill would be to drive every dollar of gold out of the country.

They read statistics showing that in the six preceding years gold had left our country at the rate of some $30,000,000 a year; that is to say, our exports of gold had exceeded our imports to that amount. Those who advocated the bill controverted that argument and contended that the reverse would be the result. The bill was passed, and during the period that this law was on the statute books not only did the gold not leave our country, but it came to us at the rate of some $60,000,000 a year, replenishing the gold reserve in the Treasury instead of depleting it. I mean to say that our imports of gold so far exceeded our exports of that metal. In 1880, when the Bland-Allison Act became generally known and its effect was being realized all over the world, the flow of gold to our country was so great that in that year our imports of gold exceeded our exports by $77,119,371, and the next year, 1881, the flow of gold to our country was much greater, our imports exceeding our exports by $97,466,127. Then, Mr. Speaker, when the bill was up in 1893 to make permanent the gold standard, every man who advocated that measure, every man who spoke for unconditional repeal, stated that the only reason why silver had fallen in value was the relative increase in the production of silver, and they read the reports of the Mint, showing that the production of silver in the few years preceding 1893 relatively exceeded that of the production of gold some 60 per cent.

They said that legislation had nothing to do with it. That resounded through these halls. They said increase of production was the only thing that caused it. This, too, was reiterated on all sides.

Why, Mr. Speaker, what have they got to say now? Last year the world's production of gold was substantially equal to that of silver, and in the face of this condition silver has fallen, and the only reason, Mr. Speaker, is legislation. They said that legislation had nothing to do with it. We said it had all to do with it, and the result has proven that we were right and that the gold men were wrong.

In 1893 by every man who spoke in this Hall and every gold man you met on the street, and every time you visited a Cabinet officer, and every time you entered the White House you were told that if we enacted the unconditional repeal, cotton would go to 10 cents and wheat would go to $1 a bushel. That was flaunted in every gold-standard paper and was stereotyped in every speech. The bill passed, and from that moment cotton commenced falling, wheat commenced falling, and all prices of property went down. Why, Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that men who were sent to Congress seem to be so ignorant about the history of the world. I assert, and I call upon any man to controvert it, that since the beginning of civilization no government on earth ever made a law the effect of which was to reduce the fundamental money of the country without the consequence resulting in falling prices, panic, and distress.

And I assert further, that no government on earth ever enacted laws to increase its redemption money but that such enactments were always followed by an increase in all industries, by rise in prices and a general and glorious prosperity. It is not necessary, Mr. Speaker, to go back and remind this House of the effect of the Bland-Allison Act upon prices and industry——

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I would like just one minute more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks for one minute more. Is there any objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The people in my section of the country have had the most vivid and painful experience in this line. When the act of 1878 was passed the great industries of the country where I live received an impetus which attracted the attention of the entire world. Money came to our country and industries of all kinds prospered. This was true not of the South alone, but of the entire country, and here is the reason: Whenever any law is passed to increase redemption money, every financier knows that the effect will be to raise prices; therefore, every moneyed man takes his money out of the hoarding places, out of the low-priced bonds, and puts it into property so as to get the benefit of the rise. The consequence is that there is always a great abundance of money seeking investment, and this infuses life and spirit into industries of every character; and so, on the contrary, when laws are passed the effect of which is to reduce the redemption money of the country the financial men of the world know, or at least believe, that it will cause a reduction in prices, and the tendency has always been to withdraw money from investments, and either hoard it or invest it in interest-bearing bonds. This has always had the effect to cause stagnation in industries, throw labor out of employment, and create panic, falling prices, and distress.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MERCER. I desire to offer the amendment which I will send to the Clerk's desk, and I move its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, after line 6, insert the following:

"Omaha Exposition: That the paragraph in the 'Act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes,' approved June 4, 1897, making appropriation of $200,000 for construction of building or buildings and for Government exhibit, be amended in the second line thereof by adding, after the word 'including,' the following words: 'the selection, purchase, preparation, installation, care, and.'"

Mr. CANNON. That covers the return, does it?

Mr. MERCER. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Then I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

For construction at the Danville Branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, at Danville, Ill., of barracks, to cost in all not exceeding $300,000, bakery and kitchen, boiler house, coal shed, officers' quarters, guardhouse, headquarters, laundry, memorial hall and chapel, mess hall, quartermaster's and commissary's storeroom; for all necessary furniture, machinery, and equipments for said barracks and other buildings, including the hospital; for fencing, grading, and sewerage; for waterworks and piping; heating plant, piping, and fixtures; and for additional land, to cost not exceeding $10,000, the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers are authorized to enter into contract or contracts, to be paid for as appropriations may be made from time to time by law, not exceeding in the aggregate for all of said enumerated objects the sum of $325,000, toward which there is hereby appropriated the sum of $100,000.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the paragraph just read; and on that proposition I desire to be heard.

This is chapter three in the history of the Soldiers' Home at Danville, Ill. In the closing hours of the Fifty-fourth Congress, a few hours before adjournment, there was passed through this House the conference report which clinched and, except for the Presidential veto, would have put into law an appropriation bill carrying a larger sum than ever before was carried by an appropriation bill in the Congress of the United States. One item in that appropriation bill was $200,000 for a soldiers' home at Danville, Ill. The bill, however, was amended in the Senate so that that item of appropriation was $150,000. The bill failed to become a law. At the session held last summer—the extraordinary session of this Congress—the bill was again passed, and in June last became a law. In that bill was this item:

To enable the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to locate, establish, and construct a branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers within the limits of the town of Danville, in the county of Vermilion, State of Illinois, and for each and every purpose connected with such erection, establishment, and construction, to be immediately available, $150,000.

That was passed, and without due consideration or debate in this House, upon the claim that the bill of which it was part had received consideration and sanction at the former session, and had only failed to become law because the President had withheld his approval. And now, a few months after the passage of that bill, with its Danville appropriation of $150,000 "for each and every purpose connected with such erection, establishment, and construction," we have here a proposition to authorize a contracting for an additional expenditure of over $500,000, with an immediate appropriation of $100,000—all for the Danville Home.

I wish to call the attention of the House again to the fact that this bill was first railroaded through the Fifty-fourth Congress without debate or amendment, or the opportunity for either; that this item was incorporated in the bill presented by the then chairman of that committee and the chairman now [Mr. CANNON], for the establishment of this home in his town. According to the reading of the item, according to a fair construction of the language, all that the gentleman hoped to get by means of his being at the head of that committee and availing himself of its advantages—all that he hoped for the time to get for Danville, Ill.—was $150,000. But now, within about six or seven months after the passage of that bill appropriating $150,000 for everything of, in, and about this home, the gentleman comes in again, asking as chairman of the committee for an additional contribution of more than half a million dollars.

Just a few minutes ago, in a discussion which occupied this House, the gentleman posed as a friend of economy, a friend of equality and justice. Then he was opposed to the slight expenditure which would be involved in the receipt by the Government of gold at the assay offices instead of at the mints. Then the gentleman was eager to save a pittance. But now, after having got this institution located in his town in the way in which he did; after having used—I will not say abused, though the suggestion perhaps would be a pertinent one—after having used his power to get that institution located in the town in which he lives, without the opportunity of competition elsewhere, without the opportunity for Representatives of other districts to suggest reasons why the location should be elsewhere, without opportunity to get an eligible location where that institution could be established most cheaply—with the least cost to the Government and the greatest advantage to the public—he is now again here trying to take over $500,000 more out of the Treasury—$100,000 now, four hundred odd thousand dollars additional to be contracted for. And with these examples before us, with the evidence of what he has done, the success which has attended his efforts, the extraordinary character of the efforts—if this also is to be successful, we may expect that perhaps in the next session—possibly before this session is over—the gentleman will be around with another of his innocent little deficiency bills, providing another half million dollars of appropriation——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I would like an extension of five minutes, if the House will kindly grant it.

Mr. BLAND. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I am not commenting on this with the hope that there will be correction of this great abuse. I am not commenting upon it on the theory that the judgment of the Representatives in this House will prevail. I am not commenting upon it on the theory that legislation on this item or legislation generally is to be conducted on the plane of giving to every Representative an equal opportunity and looking really to the public interest instead of individual advantage. But I am desiring to call the attention of this House again, and, if I may, the attention of the country, to the great abuse of a high position in order to reach into the Treasury and draw out hundreds of thousands of dollars, while at the same time, in almost the same proceeding, a few dollars or a few pennies are saved and economy vaunted.

What has been the talk in this House? The tariff measure having been found burdensome upon the people—shutting the mills in New England, giving false prosperity everywhere and real prosperity nowhere—this tariff bill not bringing in enough revenue, we hear it said, "There is to be retrenchment, there is to be economy, there is to be a close scrutiny of the appropriations." When the question arose on this floor and was discussed a few moments ago respecting a law which has been for twenty years on your statute books, whether the miners in the far regions of the West, in the Rocky Mountains, in Alaska, should have extended to them the benefits of this old law, we heard the plea for economy and retrenchment in expenditures assigned as a reason for its repeal, and yet we see extravagance in hundreds of thousands of dollars in other matters in this same bill.

It is not for me, Mr. Speaker, nor will I undertake to pass judgment on the conduct of any member on this floor. Of course it is not for me to say whether the party in power and those responsible to the country are or are not discharging properly their duties. But I do say, and I come to it again, that a great appropriation bill was passed without discussion or opportunity of amendment in a line or syllable, when the bill itself, without the item in question, could have been put through the House and properly considered in another way.

That bill, failing in the same Congress, was brought again to our attention in the extra session—that session of elegant leisure, of three-day adjournments, devoted to the building up of that monument of Republican legislation, the Dingley tariff bill; the session of long adjournments, for three days at a time, and then you would assemble again to adjourn again, for the purpose of fixing the eyes of the country upon the hesitating Senate. Some of that elegant leisure might have been devoted to the discussion of this bill. And now we have the Danville project before us again, although it never would have appeared at all if there had been a fair opportunity for its discussion.

Does the gentleman from Illinois believe, does any gentleman believe, that the Representatives from other districts in the great Mississippi Valley would have been so recreant to their duty, so blind to the welfare of the country and their constituents, and so regardless of the welfare of the soldier himself as to have conceded to the gentleman from Illinois, out in the open, such an institution in his own town without having, without demanding, at least a chance to present the merits of other localities more suitable for its location? I do not believe it. I do not believe the gentleman himself believes it.

Now, having brought that item through in that kind of a way, $150,000 to cover all the things connected with this soldiers' home, its establishment and construction, the whole business, the gentleman now comes in, within a little over six months, with a page of additional appropriations for Danville, an urgent deficiency appropriation; very urgent. If only $150,000 were needed last June, how comes the deficiency now? If six or seven hundred thousand dollars were needed for this home, why were the six or seven hundred thousand dollars not included then? Because it is easier to get things through by piecemeal.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I want the attention of this committee for a few minutes touching the facts underlying this paragraph and the necessity for the same. It is easy for a man to scold. It is easy for a woman to scold. How praiseworthy it is it is not for me to say. Common scolds at the common law were sent to the ducking stool. This is the third time that this scold has unfairly come from the gentleman from Missouri. If it improves his health, I am quite willing; and there is some gratification to me, as I recollect the two former scolds, that this side of the House was not affected by it and that side of the House, save alone the gentleman from Missouri, was not affected.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. CANNON. With pleasure, if I can have a little extension of time. I want to speak to the facts.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I hope the gentleman can have it.

Mr. OGDEN. There would be plenty of time if the gentleman from Illinois would agree to it himself.

Mr. DE ARMOND. The question which I desire to submit to the gentleman from Illinois is, How did it come that $150,000 was enough to appropriate last June and that there is now a necessity for more?

Mr. CANNON. I will cover that ground. I will cover that ground in my remarks, Mr. Speaker. I do not yield, if that is the only question the gentleman asks.

Mr. DE ARMOND. The gentleman yielded to me for a question. Does he refuse to answer?

Mr. CANNON. I will cover that ground and answer it in my own way, and not in the way of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Oh, well, of course if there is a question of choice about that, let him go on.

Mr. CANNON. I will cover that ground in my own way.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I shall await the covering.

Mr. CANNON. And I now proceed to do it. At the last session of the last Congress the Committee on Military Affairs, I believe, unanimously, as shown by the record of that Congress, reported a bill to the House for the establishment of a soldiers' home at Danville, Ill. There was great necessity for an additional soldiers' home, as there is now. There are in round numbers 18,000 people in the Volunteer Soldiers' Homes in the United States. Every Home and each Branch Home has been built; that is to say, the hospital, the kitchen, the dining hall, the general plant to accommodate the barracks.

They have barracks to fill up to their full capacity, and the Homes, as shown by the report of last year, and of the year before last as well, and by subsequent inquiry, are shown to be filled to overflowing; filled to that extent that we were informed by the Board of Managers, after a careful inquiry, that all the barracks were filled, and that men who were entitled to enter these Soldiers' Homes under the law were sleeping in hallways, in cellars, in attics; that the Homes were entirely full, so full that the health of the inmates was impaired, and they were not properly cared for, on account of the overcrowded condition. In addition to that, hundreds, aye, thousands, were turned away who were entitled to admission to these Homes. So that the Committee on Appropriations was brought face to face with the proposition that if the law establishing these Homes was to be enforced and carried out in good faith the time had come to have an additional soldiers' home or to make additions to those Homes in existence.

If the additions could have been made merely by adding barracks and there had been sufficient capacity in the balance of the plant to accommodate the inmates, that would have been the proper way to do, but the testimony from this board was that it meant an addition all along the line, and the testimony further was that all of these Homes at their respective Branches had as many people at them as ought to be gathered together in them; at Dayton over 4,000, at Leavenworth a large number, and so on from Home to Home. After investigation, your committee found that the best policy, as well as the most economical policy, was to appropriate for the commencement of another Home.

After an investigation of the bill and an exhaustive favorable report from the Committee on Military Affairs, your Committee on Appropriations included the item for $150,000 in the sundry civil bill, and it was passed. In the closing hours of the session the gentleman from Missouri, with members asleep, with both sides of the House wearied and tired out with a long, continuous session, arose in his place in the last part of the night and proceeded to scold, and scold, and scold, ad nauseam, and stated if he could not have full right to scold, we would refuse it at our peril, which was that we could not go on with the conference report. Well, I gave him the time; and finally even he wore out. The bill passed. In the special session a similar bill passed, and he scolded again. Now, I stand here, and, measuring my words, I say that more than enough men to fill this additional Soldiers' Home are now to be found in poorhouses, others tramping, denied admission which the law entitles them to a soldiers' home because there is no room for them.

So much for the merits; and still we have the trinity of the gentleman's onslaught on this occasion. Now, so far as he personally attacks myself, I do not know that I need a defense. I am glad, as this Home had to be builded, that it is located at Danville, Ill. It was a proper location—there is good water, a great coal field, and timber—a good location from every standpoint, a railroad center, the center of a soldier population. It is an apt and proper location for it. He says that I live at Danville, Ill. I have served in this House almost twenty-four years. In that entire time I undertake to say that no man has had a service in the House of Representatives in those twenty years that has had so directly in charge in the aggregate bills that appropriate money from the Treasury from everywhere—from one ocean to the other—throughout our borders, as I have, and I believe that this is the only matter that it could be said I have a personal interest in. And I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri that he must not measure his corn in my half bushel.

I am glad that the Home is located at Danville. But as to any insinuation that it is located at Danville and not needed as a Home, not an apt expenditure, not a proper expenditure, not an economical expenditure, I say to him, when he states or insinuates that, he speaks without knowledge or else his desire to scold runs away with his judgment. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, I do not know that it is necessary for me to say anything further. Ah, he says, there was only $150,000 appropriated. That was all. You can not make much headway in starting this Home before you have the ground, until you look over the ground and see where you are going to locate it. They did that. They have the hospital in course of construction, and a very good one, a hospital big enough to accommodate the Home which is provided for here. A limitation is put upon it, and the Home to be completed—as I hope it will largely be completed in the next nine months, at this season coming or the next season, when completed under the provisions of this proposed law, which places it under contract—will house 3,000 men that are entitled to admission under the law to a soldiers' home.

But the gentleman says, Why on this bill? For the simple reason that it was necessary, in the exercise of a wise economy, from the standard of humanity, to carry out the law—it was necessary that these contracts should be authorized so that the architect might promptly go on with the work in the opening season, and that the work might progress during the spring, summer, and autumn; and if the House sees proper to pass this provision, and the Senate concurs and the President approves, in two years from this time that Home will be fully occupied.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the time of the gentleman may be extended sufficiently that he may answer the question I asked him, but which, somehow, he has overlooked.

Mr. CANNON. I think I have just answered it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. The gentleman overlooked it; certainly he did not answer my question.

Mr. CANNON. I thought I had answered the gentleman's question, and I am willing that the reporter's notes shall show as to whether I answered it; and I am willing that this House, on both sides, shall judge as to whether I have answered that question.

Mr. DE ARMOND. My request was that unanimous consent be given that the gentleman's time be extended that he may answer the question.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask unanimous consent when I want it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt. I ask that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended long enough, two hours, if necessary, but long enough to permit him to undertake here to answer the question I asked him.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask for time when I want it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I am asking it for you.

The SPEAKER. Of course the gentleman from Missouri can not ask for time as a matter of argument or irony and expect the Chair to put it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Then I ask that I have time to answer the question myself. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, the question I asked the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], and one which he did not answer, was this: Why, if between $600,000 and $700,000 ought to be appropriated for the Home at Danville, Ill., was but $150,000 asked for last session? Now I will answer the question, as the gentleman has not done so.

After having located that Soldiers' Home in his own town by virtue of his chairmanship of a committee in this House and the suppression of debate, and by putting the bill through under suspension of the rules, with a Danville appropriation of $150,000, one would think that was enough of legislation—I will not say legislative outrage, but enough of legislative performance and acquisition for the time being. To have asked for $700,000 then would have shocked the moral sense of the country and would have brought to everybody such a view of attempted Treasury looting as might have cut off the appropriation of $150,000 and left the interesting village of Danville without the Soldiers' Home. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars was appropriated, and the language the gentleman employed, and which seemed to be satisfactory to him then, clearly limited the expense at Danville, Ill., for all the purposes of that institution, to the sum of $150,000.

Now, if it is necessary in order to take care of soldiers of the Union properly that there be further home facilities provided, why need they be provided at Danville? Why need the House now, after having given to the gentleman for his constituents $150,000 because he was chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and because he employed methods that no other chairman would ever have thought of—methods which I hope will not be followed by succeeding chairmen—why should the House by the adoption of this provision agree to send half a million dollars more to Danville, Ill.? When the proper time comes, or the improper time comes, or the opportunity comes, to call for another half a million, probably it will be asked for; and where will it stop, when will it end?

And yet, to call attention to this, to comment upon it, to characterize it as it deserves, as well as the limitations of parliamentary law will permit, is "scolding;" and the gentleman "has served twenty years in this House!" and the gentleman "needs no defense!" Ah, the gentleman's conduct in this matter is indefensible. "Scolding!" When a man abuses a great position, takes advantage of a high chairmanship, which ought to be held for the good of his country and for the honor of his constituency, when he avails himself of opportunities that ought to be used for the public good, and turns them to help any private and personal interest, to help people who hold lots and lands to sell them, to help the people who are interested as he is interested—when the gentleman does that, and anything is said about it, when all of three hundred and fifty-odd Representatives are not ready and willing to remain silent in this House and let these things go without remark, then the gentleman comments upon the criticism as "scolding," and for defense says he "has served here twenty years." Does he regret his lost opportunities? [Laughter.]

Does he regret so many years slipping by without such another gathering out of the Treasury, by methods extraordinary, of funds which ought not to be gathered so? He has "served twenty years" and "appeals to the people who know him."

He parades his own uprightness, his own lofty patriotism, and over and beyond that he has "served here twenty years, honored by his constituents, honored by the Speaker of the House," and then by methods he could not defend, by methods which could not be characterized properly in a parliamentary body, he manages to get a soldiers' home at $150,000 for his own beloved little town!

Now, Mr. Speaker, when was this transaction ever paralleled? Yet, after twenty years of Congressional career, he asks for another half million of dollars to spend upon that little plant. Ah, Mr. Speaker, that is to be a fine plant. The gentleman from Illinois starts with $150,000, buying some land and making a home. And now he wants more land and more town lots and more boom for Danville, and more increase of wordly stores to the citizens of Danville, including the gentleman himself, for he lives there—over $500,000 more; and when anything is said about it the utterance is characterized by the gentleman as "scolding!" I do not care whether you denominate it scolding or not. I am perfectly willing to be called a scold and regarded as a scold, if commenting upon such conduct makes one a scold. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri assumes that this appropriation is personal to the Representative from Illinois. God help him if he can not draw the distinction——

Mr. DE ARMOND. You had better call on God to help you. I am in no danger. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will take care of myself. God help you if you can not understand——

Mr. DE ARMOND. Only the prayers of the righteous prevail.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). If you can not understand that in this body gentlemen are supposed to pay some attention to the public service. I say here, now, that this appropriation for this Home is justified from every standpoint of the public service; and thank God, that being the case, it is not in my heart (if I could put myself in the gentleman's place and him in mine) to posture and undertake to demagogue from the personal standpoint because perchance I happen to live at the town of Danville. [Applause.]

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me, let me remark that it can hardly be supposed the gentleman ever demagogued. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, I say again, and I am proud to say it, that I will take my record in this Congress this session, and in the last Congress, and every other Congress since I have served here, and I will stand or fall by it; and if it were possible I would take the other side of the House and submit the case from the personal standpoint and not fear the verdict.

Now, Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned, I am ready for a vote.

Mr. TODD. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, if he will allow me, whether one provision which ought to be incorporated in this paragraph has not been omitted?

Mr. CANNON. What is that?

Mr. TODD. A provision looking to the honest and economical letting of the proposed contracts. It is usual when appropriations are made for public buildings, such as post-offices, custom-houses, etc., to make provision in the bill as to advertising for contracts, the securing of proper specifications, etc.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman that the general law provides for that. The contract service is now well understood; general provisions of law cover it.

Mr. TODD. It seems to me that under the language of this paragraph there is no protection to the people for the honest letting of the contracts.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, is the time limited for this discussion?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to be recognized.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to this discussion with some interest; and while I desire to make some observations now, I do not do so because I think the gentleman from Illinois needs any help. He has clearly demonstrated his ability to take care of himself. But it is on the general subject that I wish to say a word.

If I had had the location of this new Home, I would have located it in Iowa, of course. But it was located in Illinois, at Danville. That question has been adjudicated by a former Congress, acting upon its best judgment. There was no limitation in the bill of the last Congress as to the total cost of this Danville Home. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars, I believe, was appropriated, just as at the Marion and other Branch Homes——

Mr. DE ARMOND rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] yield?

Mr. HENDERSON. For a question.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I wish to correct the statement the gentleman has just made. The provision of the law for the establishment of this Home was in this language:

> To enable the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to locate, establish, and construct a branch National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers within the limits of the town of Danville, in the county of Vermilion, State of Illinois, and for each and every purpose connected with such erection, establishment, and construction, to be immediately available, $150,000.

In view of this language, I suggest that the act establishing this Home did limit the expenditure to $150,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not so construe the language. Exactly the same thing has been done here as was done with regard to every other Branch Soldiers' Home. And the total amount comprehended in this urgent deficiency bill for this Branch Home will, when expended, make the Danville Home cost less when completed than any other Branch Soldiers' Home.

Why, then, make this fuss about a matter that is as plain and simple as this is? The work to the extent of $150,000 is already under contract. If the soldiers are going to get the benefit of it, we need this additional amount, and we need it at once, so that the work may be put under contract, in order to provide the accommodations required for these old, broken-down men.

This is a usual appropriation. It is needed. It was recommended by the Board of Managers of the National Soldiers' Home; it was recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs; the matter was adjudicated by the last Congress, and we are now simply carrying out what was then decided upon. The time for fault finding and abuse has gone by. It is clearly the duty of Congress to put this appropriation through without a moment's hesitation.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I was on the committee in the last House that reported the bill containing the appropriation for this Home at Danville. There was very serious consideration by the members of the committee as to what should be done by way of provision for the old soldiers who had crowded into these Homes. Every Home was full to overflowing. The testimony of the members of the board in charge of the Soldiers' Homes showed that many of the inmates were sleeping in dining rooms and even in kitchens; that some immediate relief was demanded. The members of that board said they could not properly provide for the soldiers already in these Homes without additional accommodations, additional room, additional buildings.

The question, and the only question, before that committee was whether we should add barracks to the existing Homes or construct a new Home. That board, which has the confidence of the country—the gentlemen composing it have been members of it for years; General Franklin is its president, and one of its members is your own fellow-Representative, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE]—reported that in their judgment—they having given great attention to this question—it was better to construct a new home than to increase the attendance at the existing Homes. There is such a thing as congregating too many men at one point. They recommended not only that a new home be constructed, but they even went so far as to say that in their judgment it ought to be somewhere in the territory or neighborhood of the place where it was located, at Danville.

With this testimony before us, and feeling under an obligation as a committee to make provision for the soldiers who had as much right to the Homes as those who had been enjoying them for years, we reported a provision for constructing a new home and locating it at the town of Danville, Ill. That action was never questioned. The establishment of a home was never questioned at that point, because the facilities that surround Danville and make it desirable for a soldiers' home are well known and have never been disputed. The judgment of the committee in locating it there was never questioned; but simply because the chairman of that committee happened to live in Danville, that is assumed as a reason for a personal criticism in the matter.

Whatever merit, Mr. Speaker, the criticism had, it has no other now than the bare, bald fact that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations does live there. I repeat, no one has ever questioned the propriety of the location. No one has doubted that railroads center there and make it easily accessible for soldiers to go to and from the Home. No one has doubted that it possesses all the natural requisites and facilities for making it a desirable location for the purpose; but because of the sole fact that the chairman of the committee happened to live there, where it was selected by the unanimous vote of the seventeen members of the committee, Democrats and Republicans alike, I submit now whether there is any cause or any good reason for voting against the proposition, which could only be done because of the sole fact that the chairman of the committee happens to reside in Danville.

If the Board of Directors in charge of the Soldiers' Homes had seen fit to recommend that the home should be placed in the State of Pennsylvania, I should probably have been found anxious and urgent for its establishment in my district.

Mr. BRUCKER. What committee reported it?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HEMENWAY. And the Committee on Military Affairs, too.

Mr. BRUCKER. What opportunity was given for competition as to the location?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Every opportunity in the world was offered to everybody. Our committee sat with open doors, and so did the Committee on Military Affairs. It was not a question of sending out advertisements to get bids for the location of the home. The great, burning question was the question of taking care of the old soldiers who were sleeping on the floor. And inasmuch as this committee recommended it, as well as the Committee on Military Affairs, and as nobody opposed it, it was located at Danville.

What great harm is done? What great offense has been committed? What outrage upon the people perpetrated? None under the earth, except that it may give rise for personal criticism. I presume, Mr. Speaker, that every member of the House will be glad now, inasmuch as this home was to be located at all, and could not be located in all of the districts, but only in one place, which met the approval of everybody, that the members will be glad to see "Uncle Joe" have it in his district. I am sure I am, and do not think the House will waste time mourning over it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HULL). The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken; and the motion was rejected.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I offer a further amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "Danville," in line 7, page 7, and also strike out "at Danville, Ill.," in line 8, page 7.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, the object of the amendment, as is apparent from the reading of it, is to eliminate for the time being from the bill——

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to reserve the point of order on the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What point of order does the gentleman make?

Mr. HEMENWAY. That it changes existing law. This location has already been fixed in the bill. The bill already provided where the Home is to be located.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. DE ARMOND. The motion I have made is to strike out "Danville" as descriptive of the branch home and the words "at Danville, Ill.," as designating the location.

Now, whether there is any existing law that Danville must be mentioned when there is an appropriation of money for a soldier's home, and that the appropriation for the home when so specified must go to Danville, Ill., I would not like exactly to undertake to say. But my impression is that there is no existing provision of law to the effect that appropriations for soldiers' homes shall be applied exclusively to the Danville branch, at Danville, Ill. If that be true, the amendment is hardly open to the point of order. It seems to me it might be in order for us to strike out Danville and insert Dayton or Leavenworth.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Oh, yes, I yield; certainly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. I have to call the attention of my friend from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] to the question that, whether this point of order is well taken or not, I hope he will withdraw it. My own impression about it is that if you strike out the word "Danville," then it would stand:

For construction of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

And so forth. It is another way of striking out or nullifying the appropriation. It seems to me it might be possible that it will be subject to the point of order that it is in substance the former motion, but as far as I am concerned, I do not care to make that point, and I am quite willing that the House should pass upon it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. As the gentleman from Illinois wants the House to pass upon the question on its merits, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the Speaker on being saved from the painful necessity, unless he were to violate all parliamentary law and all reason, of overruling the point of order, inasmuch as there is absolutely nothing in it. [Laughter.]

I now address myself to the amendment, since the Speaker has been happily extricated from the difficult and very embarrassing position of refusing to sustain a point of order when there was absolutely nothing in it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Does the gentleman assume that the Speaker would sustain a point of order without there being anything in it?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Oh, no; I assumed that the Speaker would overrule the point of order because there was nothing in it, but it might be embarrassing.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman, then, wasted time in assuming that the Speaker would sustain the point of order.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Well, we had nothing so plentiful as time a few months ago in this House, and I assume that time has not become so exceedingly precious that much harm is going to happen from the waste of it in the consideration of this question.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. We have more time than money.

Mr. DE ARMOND. We have more time than money, as suggested by my friend here. The amendment is to strike out Danville, the beautiful city of the plains, the city that is honored by being represented by the gentleman who is taking care of it so exceedingly well, and to strike out "at Danville," when you come to identifying the precise spot, the oasis in the desert to which this money is to be carried. I think the amendment is not only in order, but I submit now, for the calm and dispassionate and judicial consideration of the gentleman from Illinois the further suggestion that the soldiers might be cared for elsewhere than at Danville, Ill., and that this amendment is not necessarily an amendment that is at all inimical to the best interest of the soldiers, but that they might be provided for somewhere else, in some other Home, by the enriching of some other local constituency, by the furnishing of a market for some other people who have land, by the doing of good somewhere else than in the city of Danville, Ill. I submit the amendment to the House, Mr. Speaker, without further remarks.

Mr. CANNON. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I have a further amendment which I desire to offer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri offers an additional amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out "Danville," in line 7, page 7, and insert in lieu thereof the words "Mississippi Valley;" and strike out the words "at Danville, Ill.," in line 8, page 7, and insert in lieu thereof the words "at some suitable point in the Mississippi Valley, to be selected by the Board of Managers of Soldiers' Homes."

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, as these amendments of the gentleman from Missouri seem to be going on in regular order, I raise the point of order that the motion to strike out the paragraph having been rejected no further amendments are now in order.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I await the gentleman's remarks on that proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. BARRETT. Now, Mr. Speaker, before the Chair decides that question——

Several MEMBERS. He has decided it.

Mr. BARRETT. I refer to page 158 of the Manual, which is very explicit onthis subject.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard on the amendment. I understand it is pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is waiting for the rule which the gentleman has cited here. What rule is it that the gentleman cited?

Mr. BARRETT. I ask the Chair to read page 158 of Jefferson's Manual, which, in the absence of any specific rule applying to the subject, is the rule of the House. It is there laid down that where the body has refused to strike out a paragraph, further amendment is not in order. And as these amendments seem to be coming one after the other, I make that point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HULL). The Chair would call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to page 240, subdivision 7, which provides:

7. A motion to strike out and insert is indivisible, but a motion to strike out being lost shall neither preclude amendment nor motion to strike out and insert; and no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

The Chair under that special rule of the House will overrule the point of order.

Mr. BARRETT. Then I make the further point of order that it changes existing law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman on that, if he can show wherein it changes existing law. [After a pause.] The Chair will overrule that point on the ground that there are several Homes in the Mississippi Valley, and if you strike out and insert these words, the Board of Managers may distribute the money to any of those Homes in the Mississippi Valley.

Mr. PAYNE. But the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri proposes to locate "a soldiers' home at a suitable place." That would be new legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That would be absolutely new legislation.

Mr. BARRETT. I could not hear the latter part of the statement of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair only heard the first part of the amendment read—to strike out and insert. That would leave the Soldiers' Homes in the Mississippi Valley to be benefited; but the latter part of the amendment moves to insert "at some suitable place in the Mississippi Valley," which would be establishing a new location, and the Chair believes these words to be subject to the point of order.

Mr. DE ARMOND. The Chair will be kind enough to hear me after hearing the parliamentarians. If the Chair would be kind enough to just withhold his decision—I mean his last, as he has made more than one—I should like to be heard on the subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair, before making the first decision, asked the Clerk whether it established a new home in the Mississippi Valley, and he said, "No; it only distributes the money to the Homes in the Mississippi Valley," having in view only the first language of the amendment. But the latter part of the language in the amendment the Chair does hold establishes a new home in the Mississippi Valley, and would be a change of existing law.

Mr. DE ARMOND. In order to save time, I ask to incorporate in the amendment, and I offer it that way—"at some suitable Soldiers' Home in the Mississippi Valley." Just incorporate the words in such a manner as will make the proper phraseology.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Will the Clerk kindly read the amendment?

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "Danville, Ill.," in line 7, page 7, and insert in lieu thereof the words "Mississippi Valley;" and strike out the words "Danville, Ill.," in line 8, page 7, and insert in lieu "at some suitable Soldiers' Home in the Mississippi Valley."

Mr. DE ARMOND. Leave the further words in there "to be selected by the Board of Managers."

The Clerk read as follows:

To be selected by the Board of Managers of Soldiers' Homes.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to address the House on the amendment pending, unless there be some parliamentary objection to it.

Mr. BARRETT. I understand the gentleman has offered another amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri has changed his amendment.

Mr. BARRETT. It is very difficult to hear at this place; and I should like to have the amendment read again.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, presuming that that amendment has passed the criticism of the parliamentarians, I now address myself to it on its merits. The proposition is not to restrict this appropriation of $500,000 and more to that beautiful village, Danville, on the plains of Illinois, but to put it where, by the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Home, it may be deemed best in the interest of the soldiers themselves and of the taxpayers to place it.

Now, if it were not for some things that have passed in the course of legislation—but for the memory of this legislation and but for the memory of twenty years that the gentleman has served in Congress—if I were proceeding upon general principles, I should think and should assume that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] himself could be counted upon to support this amendment. Because it would seem to me that it can not be that the interests of the soldiers and taxpayers would be so far forgotten and disregarded that an extra half million dollars more would be carted to Danville; that the money might be carried to some other Soldiers' Home in the great Mississippi Valley, with the effect of relieving more distress of old soldiers than can be cured at Danville, and with the result of saving largely to the people of the United States money they can ill afford to appropriate beyond what is absolutely necessary.

There is no reason for rejecting this amendment, except to give Danville the benefit of this appropriation to the exclusion of all other Soldiers' Homes. If the appropriation is for the good of the service; if it is to be made with reference to economy and fair treatment, then leave that appropriation to go to the Home where it ought to go, in order to do the most good and at the least expense. Now, what can be the objection to it? Are there no Homes in the great Mississippi Valley, except the Home at Danville, where $500,000 may be taken with profit and advantage? If not, then the amendment will not interfere with this money being carried to Danville. If there are, why ought the money to be carried to Danville to the exclusion of other Homes where it could be better expended and with better results?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. DE ARMOND. One moment. If the gentleman from Illinois will yield I would like to ask him what the land at Danville has already cost, and how much of it, and what was the price per acre?

Mr. CANNON. I do not know that I am accurately informed, but my recollection is that there are 240 acres purchased at a cost of $35,000.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DE ARMOND) there were—ayes 56, noes 89.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 74, nays 123, answered "present" 1, not voting 158; as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. DE ARMOND was rejected.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. BARRETT with Mr. SPARKMAN.

Mr. PITNEY with Mr. DOCKERY.

Mr. MANN with Mr. JETT.

For this day:

Mr. MOODY with Mr. WHEELER of Alabama.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE with Mr. BANKHEAD.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH with Mr. MADDOX.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER with Mr. SULZER.

Mr. BRUMM with Mr. DE VRIES.

Mr. BURLEIGH with Mr. SAYERS.

On this vote:

Mr. ODELL with Mr. BARTLETT.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The Clerk read as follows:

For completing the necessary repairs to dry dock No. 3, and removing the cofferdam after the repairs are completed and making good the quay walls and entrances to said dry dock, $50,000.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by striking out the last three words of the pending paragraph. It was my intention to oppose any further appropriation of money toward the completion of dry dock No. 3 at the New York Navy-Yard, but I received assurances from the Secretary of the Navy that it is his purpose to order a court-martial for a thorough, far-reaching investigation of this unfortunate affair. I have, therefore, withheld the presentation to the House of a resolution that I have prepared asking for a Congressional investigation. An article published in the New York Tribune a few days ago covers so thoroughly this subject that I ask to have it read at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE DRY-DOCK SCANDAL.

The truth is now out, before all the world, and it is seen to justify everything the Tribune said about the dock. In fact, the case is shown to be worse than the worst representations of it ever made by the Tribune. The dock was not only ill constructed, it was, according to official report, deliberately ill built, with a studied scoundrelism for which the most scathing denunciation is inadequate. The builders and inspectors apparently conspired to make the dock unfit and unsafe, and thus not only to defraud the Government of the construction price, but to imperil the safety of the costly new ships of the Navy.

The Massachusetts narrowly escaped ruin in the dock. The Indiana had on its account to be sent to a foreign country for docking. And the Iowa and the Massachusetts are now in danger of serious injury for need of the dock. That is the work of these miscreants. It is comparable only with that of the Chinese contractors who filled cartridges and torpedoes with dirt instead of gunpowder. The latter, when found out, had their heads chopped off. Their American peers—well, they will perhaps try to collect extra pay from the Government on account of the extra work their rascality has caused. The Chinese system has its good points, after all.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, that article was written by one who thoroughly understands the subject; and in consequence of the statement of the Secretary of the Navy and also the statement in that article, which is true, that the Massachusetts and the Iowa and the Indiana, for docking purposes, are unprovided for in the United States and that therefore it was necessary to send the Indiana to Nova Scotia to be docked—on those grounds, and only those, have I withdrawn my objection to this appropriation, for I do not believe there is a person connected with the Navy Department who is able at present to tell how much it will cost to complete the repairs to this dock. The Secretary has stated that he believes $50,000 will complete it; but he was not positive on that subject.

Mr. LLOYD. I wish to ask whether this is the dry dock for the repair of which an appropriation of $100,000 was made at the extraordinary session?

Mr. BENNETT. Yes; it is the same dock.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, perhaps a word of explanation as to the appropriation here proposed is due to the House. This dry dock was completed last winter, if I recollect aright, at a cost somewhere from $600,000 to $800,000. The specifications called for a good dock, and no doubt, if we may accept the opinions of skilled persons, we should have had a good dock there if the specifications had been complied with. Late last winter or early in the spring one or two ships were put in there—perhaps the Massachusetts—but the dock sprang a leak, and it was soon demonstrated that there had been faulty construction somewhere; it was not quite known where.

We have no dock on the Atlantic Coast that would dock our great battle ships. We need one; and we need it now in the shortest possible time. At the special session we appropriated, on the recommendation of the Navy Department, $100,000 for the repair of this dock. It was not then known just how much money it would take. Since that time——

Mr. LLOYD. May I ask another question?

Mr. CANNON. Let me complete this explanation.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, is it not a fact that $100,000 was appropriated at the extra session last summer for the repair of this dock?

Mr. CANNON. It is, sir.

Mr. LLOYD. At the extra session of Congress it was represented that there was a leak in dry dock No. 3, New York Harbor, which should be repaired at once. The report of the engineer of the Naval Department who examined the injured dock was presented, but time was not taken to read it. The recommendation of the Chief of the Bureau of Dry Docks was that there be appropriated $30,000 to make the repairs, $48,000 to build a cofferdam about the dock, and $22,000 for contingencies. This was hurriedly considered by the House, the vote taken, and the appropriation was made in accordance with said recommendation, when, as shown by the report of the engineer, who alone had the matter investigated and knew of the cost of the necessary repairs, less than $30,000 would overcome the injury.

Now, an urgent deficiency bill is presented asking that $50,000 more be appropriated to complete said repairs and to remove the cofferdam. It would seem that there is something radically wrong about the appropriations for that purpose. I fear some one is profiting by the desire of this body to maintain this largest and most important dry dock on the Atlantic Coast. It appears to me that this House would do well to call a halt in appropriations for that dock and ascertain whether the leak is one which only money can stop, or whether it is one which may be remedied by mechanical skill.

I believe from the proceedings here and what I have read of this matter that $500,000 would be spent to repair that leak if this body would appropriate it.

Mr. CANNON. I wish the gentleman would let me complete my statement, and then if I have not covered the case I will answer any question.

Mr. LLOYD. I was about through. I only wanted to call attention to this fact——

Mr. CANNON. I do not think I can yield for a speech. I am trying to state the facts about this matter.

One hundred thousand dollars was appropriated for repairs of this dock. After that the cofferdam was constructed, the water pumped out, and it was found that the outer line of piling, which ought to have averaged 40 feet in depth, averaged from 4 to 19 feet, if I recollect aright. Of course it washed out and let the water in. And the inner line of piling has lately been shown to be imperfect, there having been several breaks in it.

The Secretary of the Navy and Constructor Bowles, after these investigations, come to us and say that in their opinion—they do not write any insurance policy, but express their opinion—these repairs can be made for $50,000. These being the circumstances, it seemed to your committee that nothing was left except to recommend this appropriation.

There was naturally some desire to know where the fault in this matter rested. That there was fault the Secretary of the Navy stated in the examination he had no doubt. He did not want any investigation to ascertain that fact, but said there was such fault that he deemed it his duty to order a court-martial. He will no doubt proceed along the line in which his duty lies. It may be that $50,000 will not repair this dock. Assistant Naval Constructor Bowles, who seems to understand himself, gives it as his opinion that it will, and the Secretary of the Navy concurs with him. Therefore we recommend the item.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that the Secretary of the Navy and one of the constructors of the Navy were before the subcommittee that prepared this bill. Now, I am not an expert in such matters, but somehow or other I have reached the conclusion that it would be more economical and better for the Government to blow up the dock with dynamite and get rid of it. But the Secretary of the Navy and Mr. Bowles, the constructor, were before the committee.

Mr. Bowles is an educated, scientific gentleman, and is thoroughly posted in his profession. For the information of the House, I would like to have read a portion of his statement before the subcommittee. We were guided by his statement entirely in recommending the appropriation. I ask the Clerk to read the portion which is marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK NAVY-YARD DOCK.

[Statement of Naval Constructor F. T. Bowles.]

Mr. SAYERS. Are you in charge of the repairs of this dock now?

Mr. BOWLES. Yes, sir.

Secretary LONG. I took it out of the hands of the Bureau of Yards and Docks and put it in his.

Mr. SAYERS. You ask for an appropriation of $50,000. Is it your opinion that this will be sufficient to fully repair the dock, and that when it shall have been expended the dock will be in a condition to give effective service for twenty years? If not for so long, for how long? Now, just answer that question as you please and express your opinion.

Mr. BOWLES. It should be understood that work of this character is risky. It is liable to contingencies which can not be foreseen—from leaks or from springs in the soil—and the whole character of the work makes it impossible to foresee these contingencies or absolutely state that a certain sum of money is going to be sufficient, and I can not state that. From the condition of the work in which I left it last night, I believe that $50,000 will complete the repairs. I wish to have it understood that the position of the dock and the condition of the surrounding land makes it possible that a disaster may occur there that would increase by ten times the amount of money necessary to put that dock in order. I want to make it clear to the committee that as far as human minds can see at present $50,000 will put the dock in good order.

Mr. SAYERS. For twenty years?

Mr. BOWLES. For twenty years. I have consulted with the most experienced men in building docks, and they concur with me in that opinion—that the work I have laid out there will be sufficient and expedient to make that useful for the lifetime of a wooden dock.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that your judgment?

Mr. BOWLES. That is my best judgment; but I want to have it clearly understood that I can not insure it, or that anybody can.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, it is due to Mr. Bowles, the Naval Constructor, to say that he had nothing whatever to do with the construction of this dock. A civil engineer connected with the Navy Department, Mr. Menocal, was one of the representatives of the Navy Department——

Mr. BENNETT. He was the chief engineer.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes; the chief engineer who overlooked the construction of the dock as it was progressing. Mr. Menocal is now absent from the country, but we had the assurance of the Secretary of the Navy that he would immediately convene a court-martial to consider the case and to find such conclusions as the circumstances might demand.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to go on record as watching the proceedings in relation to this dock and its completion. I desire to state to the House that if the investigation of the Secretary of the Navy is not full and complete, I shall present my resolution to the House for a thorough Congressional investigation.

The SPEAKER. Is the formal amendment withdrawn?

Mr. BENNETT. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Indian affairs:

For completion of the survey of the lands in the Indian Territory, $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. CANNON. I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 9, in line 16, after the word "completion," insert the words "by the Geological Survey."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For surveying and allotting Indian reservations, $8,000.

For pay and expenses of Ute Commission, $12,660.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 9, after line 22, insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in connection with the survey and establishment of the east boundary of the Southern Ute Reservation, in Colorado, from the point established by the United States Geological Survey at the intersection of the one hundred and seventh degree of longitude with the thirty-seventh degree of north latitude to the northeast corner of said reservation, and for the continuation of the north and south boundaries of said reservation to connect with said east boundary, to allow, in his discretion, such rates of mileage or such per diem compensation and necessary expenses as will secure the prompt execution of the work. The cost attending said survey to be paid from the appropriation of $350,000, per section 9 of the act of Congress entitled 'An act to accept and ratify the agreement submitted by the confederated bands of Ute Indians in Colorado for the sale of their reservation in said State, and for other purposes, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same,' approved June 15, 1880."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I have looked into that amendment. I hold in my hand a telegram from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and have also talked with the gentleman about the matter. I have no doubt that the amendment is proper and along the line of the public service, and this, too, notwithstanding that the money will be expended in the State which the gentleman represents. [Laughter.]

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 398) for the correction of muster of Adolph Von Haake, late major Sixty-eighth Regiment Veteran Volunteer Infantry, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4303) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HAWLEY. The bill (S. 2637) for the relief of Rev. Edwin Warriner, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, is unnecessary because the relief asked for was granted in a bill passed February 1, 1897. The committee therefore direct me to report the bill back adversely, with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be indefinitely postponed, in the absence of objection.

He also, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 924) to authorize the Washington and Glen Echo Railroad Company to obtain a right of way and construct tracks into the District of Columbia 600 feet, reported it with an amendment.

PRODUCTION OF PRECIOUS METALS.

Mr. PERKINS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Whereas from the report No. 1338 of the Fifty-fourth Congress, second session, submitted by the Committee on Mines and Mining of the United States Senate, it appears that additional information is desirable in regard to the localities from which the precious metals are produced in the United States, including Alaska, showing the exact amount of gold produced by each mining district in the United States and the proportion which comes from placer mines and from deep mines, and the conditions of occurrence of ores of the precious metals, including a report on the occurrence of gold in the United States portion of the Yukon district.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish the Senate a statement as to whether or not it would be consistent with public interests for the Government to collect and publish such information, with a plan therefor and an estimate of the cost.

PROTECTION OF AMERICAN CITIZENS IN CUBA.

Mr. CANNON. I present a resolution, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Utah will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President is requested to transmit to the Senate at his earliest convenience a statement showing what measures are in force by this Government in the Island of Cuba, and in waters contiguous thereto, to protect the lives, liberty, and property of American citizens now dwelling in Cuba.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I think that resolution should contain the usual clause which is contained in resolutions addressed to the President, submitting the matter to his discretion, by inserting after the word "requested" the words "if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interests." It is possible that there may be some secret matter which should not be made public.

Mr. CANNON. I was not able to hear the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that the Senator should insert in the resolution what I believe is the invariable clause in such resolutions, requesting that the information be furnished by the President if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interests.

Mr. CANNON. I shall be very much pleased to have the resolution modified in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to have the resolution again read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read as modified.

The Secretary read the resolution as modified.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. OVERSTREET, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. 6251) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for prior years, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 4221) to confirm certain cash entries of public lands; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 6251) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for prior years, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator from Minnesota withdraw the motion for a moment? I wish to suggest that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] has some remarks to make upon the immigration bill, he tells me, and I believe the agreement was that if any Senator desired to speak upon that topic at any time before the day fixed for voting he might do so.

Mr. DAVIS. Of course, if the Senator from Louisiana wishes to address the Senate, I withdraw the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana gave notice of intention to speak. Does the Senator from Minnesota withdraw the motion?

Mr. DAVIS. I withdraw the motion, at the suggestion of the Senator from California, to accommodate the Senator from Louisiana.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is withdrawn. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 112) to amend the immigration laws of the United States.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, the pending bill is as mild a form of antagonism to immigration as nativism will permit.

Its second section imposes an educational test of no very stringent character, so far as the test itself is concerned. But, sir, it is the beginning of a new departure. From the foundation of the Government we have invited, yea, solicited, the hardy, pushing, adventurous peoples of the Caucasian family to our free and hospitable shores. They responded to the call. They came, they saw, they conquered the wilderness and the waste places; they felled the forests, they developed the mines, they plowed the fields, they moved the spindles and the looms. In the vast hive of human industry in these free States they have been among the busiest. Their genius, their labor, and their industry have aided every pursuit, developed every art, and augmented every gain. When the original colonies established their independence, they were but a straggling line of thin settlements stretching along the Atlantic Seaboard. The interior of the country was but little settled. The vast Mississippi Valley was a solitude. The great intermountain States were unknown, or if known, considered barren. The golden sands of the Pacific were more remote than the land of Cathay was to the sublime imagination of Columbus.

Then came the industrial army from the old to make of the new a greater and a better world. They came, not as of old came their ancestors from the steppes of Asia, to waste and obliterate civilization and its fruits, but, uplifting high the banner of industry and peace, to make glad the waste places and to cause the wilderness to "blossom as the rose." And, sir, there is no marvel of fiction, no achievement of reality stranger than fiction, that equals the transformation of a continent from the wigwam of the savage and the lair of the wild beast to the myriad homes of happy, peaceful, industrious mortals devoted to every pursuit that satisfies the wants and to every art that ministers to the tastes of highly cultured and enlightened humanity.

And the transformation has been the work of the white immigrant. Having been done, we smite the hand that has upbuilded us and put a stigma on the workman whose skill and toil are our pride and our boast.

And, sir, to give a sting to ingratitude some of those who, coming from a foreign shore, have prospered beneath the Stars and Stripes, and many descended from ancestors recently subjects of foreign princes, are clamorous to bar the avenue to any further unrestricted immigration into our borders. Thus it is that the evil of native selfishness has been quickly assimilated by some of the foreign born in our midst.

It is unquestionable that every country has the right to protect itself against the dangers that lurk in the admission of races whose ideas, manners, and habits are hostile to its social organization and its public or private welfare. In accordance with this view we have enacted laws which exclude the Chinese.

It is proper and just to hold this continent against the Mongolian. He is not of the type of man that, from the earliest dawn of civilization to date, has advanced mankind to a high standard of excellence and culture. A great wall landward and the hitherto inviolate sea have kept him isolated. With isolation has sprung a condition of supine contentment and ignorant arrogance. Century follows century, and he is the same stolid, self-satisfied being. He fears no rival, yet repels all strangers; he acknowledges no superior, yet fears all competitors. For him no sun of liberty ever shone, nor fraternal feeling for mankind ever thrilled. For him no impulse of patriotism urges resistance to the invader, but with the stolid indifference born of a despotism older than history, he yields to the conquering banner of the Aryan.

And the huge, lifeless body of inert China is now a prey to the spoiler. Without the will to resist, it lies as helpless before the greed of the Kaiser and his coplunderers as was the Aztec before Cortes or the Kanaka before the sugar planter.

Sir, the exclusion of the Chinese is justified by every principle of wise policy and every law of retaliation. Their doors have been closed to the world. They have wallowed in their exclusiveness and selfishness for a period beyond human record; and when the end is nigh, they serve but to point the moral that isolation and arrogance and selfishness are not the rôle for wise or great nations to play in this world's grand theater. And, sir, we are told by this bill to take the initiative of a Chinese policy.

"Behold!" say its proponents. "Are we not better than the unfortunate man or woman of our kind, but of foreign shores, desirous of sharing in the bounties which a beneficent Providence and our own free institutions have given us, who, arrived at 16 years of age, can not read or write?" "We are the salt of the earth!" "We are a superior set of beings!" "We have a heritage which we must keep unpolluted from the touch of ignorance!" "We can not admit a brave, strong, industrious Irishman or Swede or Italian who can not read. To do so, is to add to the undesirable element in our midst."

Sir, this to me is Chinese. It is not American. It is a plunge into a policy which we have never adopted, and I hope never will. The nations of Europe, from which exclusively our immigrants come, are of the same great branch of the human family as we are. It is the great Caucasian branch. That branch is divided into two main stems—the Semetic and the Aryan. The latter has furnished the vast bulk of our immigrants, and from it our Revolutionary forefathers are mostly descended. There can be no danger arising from an admixture among our people of a fresh lot of our Caucasian race. We find that, at the same remote period, the dominant races of the world of to-day burst forth from the steppes of Asia, and flowing westward and southward at irregular periods, drove out the primitive settlers and possessed themselves of their territory.

They founded empires and kingdoms and built up civilizations which in many respects rival the splendid achievements of this the most advanced and extraordinary of all civilizations. Succeeding waves wiped out prior civilizations and institutions, until, after the last and grandest of all—the Roman civilization—was obliterated, the roving for conquest ceased, and mankind settled down to subdue the earth, and not to spoil his coworker.

The savage and the half-civilized are the common victims and the exception to the above statement. The migration of the hordes that swept down upon the fertile plains of Europe was prompted more by hunger and necessity than by love of conquest. Alaric and Attilla fought for food and spoils; Alexander and Napoleon for conquest and glory. The first two destroyed as they went, the second two subdued and upbuilded.

The migratory spirit will never be extinguished in the great races which have peopled this New World. It is good it is so. Steam and its application, the printing press and its uses, and all the wonderful mechanism that knits and is constantly knitting the Caucasian families of men closer together, make known to and bring within the compass of our race everywhere the opportunity of bettering their condition by immigration.

The adventurous, the hardy, the self-reliant, are those who risk the perils of the wilderness and the proscriptions of other lands and peoples. They are the ones who constantly infuse new blood and fresh vigor into old social organizations. They are as necessary for the national vigor as new blood is to families.

And so, in the beneficence of God, mankind, in this age, migrates to help, to benefit, to build up, to freshen, and to strengthen the people or the country whither he goes, and not to destroy, to obliterate. He comes now as a friend, not as a foe. He does not come as the Goth or the Vandal or the Hun, to possess himself of the substance of the stranger with whom he casts his lot. He comes to make his country his own, to be of his household, to add to his store of "corn and wine and oil," to defend his flag in war and to obey it in peace.

But, sir, we are told that illiterate immigrants threaten to injure the standard of our citizenship. No danger to our institutions or our citizenship has ever arisen from admitting immigrants who can not read and write. Out of a mixture of the Puritan and Cavalier, the Huguenot and the Papist, the Anglo-Saxon, the Teuton, the Gael, the Scandinavian, the Slav, the Semite, and the Latin, literate and illiterate, has sprung a people marked by the strongest national characteristics. The American is a type of man as well and clearly defined as the Englishman, the German, or the Frenchman. He stands forth as the representative and composite of the best of all the races from which he springs. God has placed him in this continent to build up and maintain a "government of the people, by the people, and for the people." This great Government is the outgrowth of the labor and the valor of countless immigrants who would be disqualified by the pending bill.

Sir, it does not follow that a man is a good citizen because he can read and write or a bad one because he can not. Whoever is vigorous in body and sound in mind, honest and industrious, is a good citizen. It has been computed that every such man is worth $800 to the nation. Nor does it follow that every man who can read and write is intelligent and whoever can not is ignorant. Many an intelligent youth of Irish, German, Scandinavian, or Italian birth is not able to read and write at 16 because of a lack of educational facilities at home or because arduous and incessant toil from tender years prevented. Admit him; he is a good citizen. He will help to augment our wealth, to build up our nation. No immigrant not a pauper, or insane, or diseased, or criminal should be turned away from our shores. Such are excluded by existing law.

There is need in some States for a qualification on suffrage. Rhode Island and Massachusetts impose educational and property qualifications. Mississippi and South Carolina have likewise imposed similar qualifications. I find no fault with such laws. Every State must legislate in regard to restriction on suffrage according to the character and condition of its inhabitants.

But a citizen of the United States is one thing, and a voter in a

State quite another. The educational qualification may be imposed on suffrage on the ground that a citizen who is absolutely ignorant is not qualified to judge of the capacity of the lawmakers and the rulers who offer themselves for position. If there is any danger to the elective franchise from illiteracy, the States can remedy it by adequate legislation.

There is a clear distinction between a citizen and a voter. The quality of being able, through a selected agent, to make laws and provide rulers is different from the quality of quiet obedience, both to the laws and to the rulers. The latter quality is as essential as the former. A law-abiding, industrious citizen is one thing; an active participant in elections to select men to make laws is quite another thing. It so happens that the most universally intelligent and best educated part of the community do not vote. They are the women of our land. Who will say that they are not good citizens?

The States can be trusted to take care of the elective franchise. Any qualification, either of property or education, or both, lies within their wisdom. The United States have no voters, and it is clearly an error to apply to immigration a restriction which is only applicable to suffrage. Nor does it follow, from any restrictive legislation by the States in regard to the elective franchise, that any reflection is cast on the worth of a citizen who is not a voter. The United States have a wider field than the States. Will the stranger who comes to our shores obey the laws? Will he labor in our vineyards and fields and factories? If yea, let him shelter under the flag and enjoy the heritage which the courage and labor of our forefathers have given us, and who, like the stranger, came from over distant seas.

A large number of the supporters of this bill favor the incorporation into the United States of the Hawaiian Islands, with their heterogeneous mass of Asiatics, Portuguese, and Kanakas. The latter, I am informed, can read and write almost universally. Does it follow that they are desirable citizens of the United States? Would Senators who are supporting this bill prefer an Hawaiian who can read and write to an Irishman who can not, as a citizen of this Republic? Here comes a hard-working, hard-fisted, able-bodied young Swede, 16 years old, not knowing one letter from another. Here is a Russian Jew, knowing a dozen languages, learned and shrewd, but filled to the brim with anarchistic and destructive theories. Which of the two is the desirable immigrant?

Sir, if an immigrant is undesirable on account of his race, exclude the whole race, as you have the Chinese; but do not strike from the list of American citizenship the uneducated men who are capable of adding to your material wealth and national greatness.

Neither the statement that illiterate immigrants will lower the standard of citizenship or that literate or illiterate immigrants will lower the prices of wages is correct.

In all the years since the foundation of the Government, American citizenship has been ascending a higher, and still higher, scale. Education is more universal and more extensive. Activity in every line of science and art and learning; enormous strides in the invention of new, and the better adjustment of old, devices to every branch of industry; a growing sobriety and morality among the masses attest the intelligence, the vigor, and the excellence of our citizenship.

In all the arts and ways of peace, the United States have forged to the front, and are now distancing all rivals. Has the "quality of our citizenship" been injured by the crowds of foreigners who have come to our shores, if supremacy in the arts and ways of peace marks the quality of citizenship? It is useless to print long columns of figures to show that the "undesirable class of immigrants," meaning the Italians, Portuguese, Russians, and Hungarians, flock to the slums of the Eastern cities, and supply the largest percentage of illiterates. If there was not work for them, they would not go. If there is work, then they are needed in the factories and workshops of those cities. That the native American descended from foreign parents progresses beyond recent foreign arrivals shows there is room and opportunity for progress in these hospitable shores; shows that the foreigner does not drag the American down, but the American elevates him to a higher standard, until, in a few generations, he is molded in the best type of man now on earth—the American.

The tables of distribution of the immigrants contained in the report on this bill by the Committee on Immigration, which I incorporate here, show that from 1850 to 1895 the mass of immigrants were "congested" in the North Atlantic and North Central States. Why is the argument made now that the South and West will not be injuriously affected by excluding white illiterates, as they all go to the East and North? Slavery kept all white immigrants out of the South in the antebellum days, and the enfranchised colored people have kept them out postbellum. And, sir, much to the advancement of the East and North, and much to the detriment of the South.

Distribution of the foreign-born population for the last five decades, the destination of immigrants for the last three years, and the distribution of the white foreign-born paupers and criminals for 1890, compared.

In 1850 the South Atlantic States received 4.67 per cent of the foreign immigration, and in 1890 2.25 per cent. The North Atlantic received 59.06 per cent in 1850, and 42.04 per cent in 1890. Will the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. LODGE, say that the quality of Northern citizenship has been thereby injured, and that of the South maintained in its original excellence? Will anybody say that the 230,832 immigrants, who arrived at our ports during the last fiscal year, have injured the quality of citizenship of upwards of seventy millions of people? Concede that 10 per cent of the whole number was "undesirable," can anyone seriously argue that 23,000 illiterate immigrants can so leaven the lump of our manhood and womanhood as to injure it? Why, Mr. President, the largest immigration in any one year was 788,992 in 1882. This vast number of foreigners was scattered all over the United States, and no one can say that the standard of citizenship was thereby lowered.

I quote as follows from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1897:

Immigration to the United States during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1897, shows a decrease of 112,435 from the arrivals for the preceding year, and was the smallest in volume since the subject has been under Federal supervision, where it was placed by the act of August 3, 1882. In fact, it is the smallest of any fiscal year since 1879, during which year 177,826 were reported to have arrived. During the year now reported 230,832 persons arrived, of whom 228,952 were permitted to land and 1,880 were debarred and deported in accordance with law. Of those deported, 328 belonged to the class known as alien-contract laborers, and 1,289 were returned as belonging to the classes of aliens prohibited from admission under the act approved March 3, 1891. In addition, 263 persons, who had become public charges within one year from arrival, were returned either at the expense of the steamship line by which they were brought or at the expense of the immigrant fund.

The number of immigrants who fell into temporary distress within one year after landing was 1,424. These unfortunates were relieved, and their maintenance and hospital charges paid from the immigrant fund.

The heavy decrease in immigration is attributed largely to recent restrictive legislation. The Commissioner-General in his report shows that the annual average for the period 1884 to 1893, inclusive, was 472,063. After the legislation of 1891 and 1893 became effective, the annual average in the period 1894 to 1897, inclusive, fell to 279,566. Some other causes are also reported as reasons for decreased immigration, such as the influence on immigration which other countries are exercising by means of bounties and land grants.

The amount of money brought into the country by immigrants can not be accurately given, owing to the fact that they are not required to disclose any sum in excess of $30. The report of the service, however, shows that during the year immigrants exhibited to the inspectors sums which aggregated $3,541,241.

This report shows a decrease of 112,435 from the previous year. The Secretary says this decrease "is largely attributed to recent restrictive legislation." The amount of money brought into this country by the immigrants of 1897 was $3,541,241. The number of illiterates, as compared with those of 1895 and 1896, was largely decreased.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1896 is as follows:

The annual report of the Commissioner-General of Immigration for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1896, shows that there arrived in this country 343,267 immigrants, of whom 340,468 were permitted to land, and 2,799 were debarred and returned to the countries whence they came at the expense of the steamship companies by which they were brought. The increase in immigration over the preceding year amounted to 87,731.

Those denied admission into the United States included 2,010 who were likely to become public charges, and 776 who were held to be contract laborers. There were also returned 233 who had become public charges within a year after landing, some, if the cause of distress existed prior to arrival, at the expense of the steamship companies responsible for their transportation, the other at the expense of the immigrant fund. From causes arising within one year after landing, 1,946 immigrants fell into temporary distress, and the cost of their maintenance and hospital charges were paid either by steamship companies or from the immigrant fund, as found to be proper.

The Commissioner-General reports that, with some exceptions, the immigrants of the past year were of a hardy, laboring class, accustomed and able to earn a living wherever industrious people can obtain employment. It is estimated that the money brought with them amounted to at least almost $5,000,000, and was probably much in excess of that figure, since only those having less than $30 are required to disclose the exact amount, and it is known that very many bring the savings of years in order to buy lands and build homes. It is noted that among the immigrants of the past year over 14 years of age, 28.63 per cent were illiterate, as against 20.37 per cent for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895.

The immigrants of that year "were, with few exceptions, a hardy, laboring class, accustomed to earn a living wherever industrious people can obtain employment." They brought in $5,000,000. And notwithstanding there were 28.63 per cent of the 340,468 who came in illiterate, they were a most desirable class of people, bringing in $5,000,000, which, the Secretary says, does not represent the full amount, as only those having less than $30 were compelled to disclose what they brought.

According to the last report, immigration is restricting itself. The present law prohibiting contract laborers, convicts, and diseased and insane people is amply sufficient to guard our citizenship from injury, if any injury threaten it.

Now, Mr. President, let us see whether our territory is overcrowded and the wages of our laborers lowered in consequence of immigration pushing American laborers to the wall.

There are in the United States, excluding Alaska, 1,500,000 square miles of arable land, 282,000 of which are in cultivation. This is about 20 per cent of the whole. Our population could easily be multiplied fivefold without crowding. The South and West and North and East—the latter to a limited extent—could supply much unoccupied territory to thrifty inhabitants. The South especially is a most inviting field for development Not only the farms, but the factories and the mines, call for more labor. Sir, I introduce an extract from a speech made by Mr. Depew on the celebration of Forefathers' Day on the 22d day of December last, as follows:

> The wildest dreamer of even a decade ago would not have predicted that the products of our factories could compete in their own markets with the manufacturers of the Old World, but the carpets of Yonkers are being sold at Kidderminster; the rails of Pittsburg can be laid down in Liverpool; the great bridge which Holland is to build over one of its inland seas was captured by an American firm against all European competition as to price, though denied the American from patriotic motives.

Sir, the eloquent orator might have included pig iron shipped from Alabama to Europe, and cotton goods from South Carolina to the Orient. The rapid advance in our export of domestic manufactures is attracting the attention of the world. It is claiming serious criticism of the policy of restriction in things as well as restriction in men. Not only have we a vast undeveloped territory to give work to the farmer, but the mines, the forests, and the factories want hands, and more hands. That portion of the immigrants who locate in the Atlantic ports do so because carpets, rails, pig iron, and cotton cloth are being made in those ports and sold to the "pauper" countries, immigrants from which are said to be lowering the price of the wages of our own laborers. There is an advance in our trade which, if not checked by foolish and useless legislation like this bill and the kindred measure of restriction passed in the extra session, will give the United States preeminence in every market where machine-made merchandise can be sold. In this connection, I introduce a table showing the growth of our exports at a constantly increasing ratio.

WORTHINGTON C. FORD,
Chief of Bureau.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Bureau of Statistics.

In 1835 the total exports of manufactured goods was $115,215,802. In 1846 it was $109,583,248. The exports from 1835 to 1846 were about stationary. From that period they have been steadily increasing. In 1892 they were $1,030,278,148, the highest ever reached. In 1897 this point was passed, the figure standing at $1,050,993,556, and will, in another fiscal year, exceed this sum by $5,000,000.

I also quote the following from an article in the North American Review for this month, by Mr. Worthington C. Ford, the able and accomplished Chief of the Bureau of Statistics:

Another point can not be too strongly urged, that the commercial power of the United States in foreign markets is due to the fact that its high-priced labor produces a lower-priced article than can be obtained elsewhere. * * * Nor is this prime factor of low labor cost confined to crude materials. The export of manufactured articles bears testimony to the increasing ability of the American product to meet competitors in foreign markets. In 1890 the value of manufactures of iron and steel exported first touched $25,000,000; in 1897 the exports were $57,497,000, of which more than one-half was in machinery. Before 1890 a total export of the articles classed in the trade returns as manufactures never touched $150,000,000. In 1897 this total was more than $276,000,000. Large as were the exports of these manufactures in 1897, they will show a good further increase in 1898. In three months of the fiscal year 1898, already passed, they show an increase of $5,000,000 on the returns for the corresponding period of 1897.

Besides, sir, not only do we undersell the handiwork of pauper labor, largely through enterprising labor seeking our shores, but the price of labor here is not lowered in consequence, as appears by the following statement from the report of the Immigration Investigation Commission for the year 1895:

The influence of immigration is too large and complex a subject for the commission to discuss with any fullness at the present stage of its investigation. The opinion is widespread that wages have fallen since the great tide of immigration set in. The facts do not bear this out. The statistics of immigration already given (see page 8) show that large immigration has almost invariably been coincident with (not necessarily the cause of) prosperity, and the report of the Senate subcommittee of 1891, which was charged with the duty of ascertaining the course of prices and wages of labor, shows further that wages have been highest during these same periods of prosperity. Not only, according to this report, have wages steadily increased during the last three decades of steadily increasing immigration, but they have been the highest during those years in which immigration has been the largest (page 19).

Our friends the "enemy" are slow to learn the economic truth that low-priced labor is not always cheap labor, nor, conversely, is a high-priced labor dear labor.

The American exporters are demonstrating every time they export articles abroad which compete with old-established industries that our high-priced labor is more than a match for their low-priced labor. In cotton and wool manufactures, in iron and wood, we are about to lead the world. Let Fall River get out of the rut of protection and make cotton fabrics that Englishmen and Frenchmen appear to excel them in and they can export cotton prints to Manchester as well as South Carolina can export the coarse fabric to Hongkong and Tokyo. Too much protection has caused them to rely on the home market exclusively. The South will eventually occupy the field for all the medium and coarser grades, and the mills of New England, after supplying the home market for the finer articles at a price run up to the importing point, rest on their oars and cut wages 11 per cent.

Sir, a career of boundless prosperity opens up before us. But we must take care lest our unwise restriction of immigrants and our cruel, foolish laws of prohibition of foreign goods do not work us woe.

Count Goluchowisk, in his call of Europe to arms against American trade, is only voicing a sentiment of fear, engendered by the astonishing victories of American manufacturers in the very markets against which they demand protection. And now, sir, after committing the folly of enacting a law to prohibit revenue by restricting foreign goods, let us not commit the greater folly of adopting another to prohibit the United States from capturing the markets of the world by shutting out the hand that guides the plow, wields the pick, and handles the spindle and the loom.

One other observation I desire to make before closing, and that is this: It has been industriously urged, and figures have been adduced to prove the contention, that crime among the foreigners located in our midst is more extensive than among the natives. The following statement from Mr. Hart, secretary of the board of corrections and charities of Minnesota, which I take from a speech delivered in the Senate by the honorable Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], in the second session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, disproves these figures. Here is what Mr. Hart says:

BOARD OF CORRECTIONS AND CHARITIES, STATE CAPITOL,
St. Paul, Minn., April 27, 1896.

DEAR SIR: * * * The statistics which are published showing the ratios of crime are entirely misleading as applied to foreign immigration, for the reason that the prisoners are compared with the entire population of the country—men, women, and children. The children furnish practically no criminals and are nearly all credited to the native-born population, so that the children of foreign-born parents are credited to the native-born population and used against their own parents.

Of the prisoners of the United States, 95 per cent are above the age of 15 years and 84 per cent are above the age of 21 years, so that the children ought to be left out of the count. The women of the country furnish only 9 per cent of the criminals, and they may be left out of the count.

In Table No. 1, which I inclose herewith, I have compared the male prisoners of the United States with the males of voting age, and the result is just the opposite from that which is obtained by comparing the prisoners with the males of voting age.

The native-born population of the United States in 1890 numbered 53,390,600; the native-born prisoners, 65,977; ratio, 1,235 to a million. The foreign population numbered 9,231,381; the foreign-born prisoners, 16,352; ratio, 1,744 to a million, an apparent excess of foreigners over natives of 41 per cent.

But the number of native-born males of voting age was 12,591,852; native-born male prisoners 61,637; ratio, 4,895 to a million. The number of foreign-born males of voting age was 4,348,459; foreign-born male prisoners 14,287; ratio, 3,285 to a million; showing an actual excess of natives over foreigners of 50 per cent.

In the table I have omitted the Southern States, for the reason that they contain only 7.5 per cent of the foreign-born prisoners in the United States; but if the Southern States were included, it would make the showing worse for the native born on account of the large number of colored prisoners.

It will be seen from the table that the men of foreign birth furnish less prisoners proportionally than those of native birth in each division of the Northern States, as follows (see columns 2 and 3 of Table No. 1):

Number of prisoners to each million males of voting age.

	Foreign born.	Native born.
Northern States	3,240	4,445
North Central division	1,915	3,550
North Atlantic division	4,615	5,205
Western division	4,360	6,410

By reference to Table No. 1 it will be seen that the showing is in favor of the foreign born in every Northern State and Territory except Maine, New Hampshire, Arizona, and New Mexico. While the showing is more favorable to the native born in the Northern States than for the whole country, the ratio of the native-born criminals is still 37 per cent larger than that of the foreign born.

If we compare the foreign born with the pure native born—i. e., the native born of native parents—the showing is more favorable to the native stock. (See columns 2 and 5 of the table.)

Number of prisoners to each million males of voting age.

	Foreign born.	Native born of native parents.
Northern States	3,240	4,075
North Atlantic division	4,360	4,135
North Central division	1,915	3,715
Western division	4,615	6,050

In the North Atlantic division alone the ratio of foreign-born prisoners exceeds that of the pure native born. The excess is found in Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Pennsylvania; but in Rhode Island, New York, and New Jersey the showing is in favor of the foreign born. In the Central and Western divisions the record is in favor of the foreign born in every case except Arizona and New Mexico.

If we compare native born with native born, the result is as follows (see columns 3, 4, and 5, Table No. 1):

Number of prisoners to each million males of voting age.

	Total native born.	Native born; parents foreign.	Native born; one or both parents native.
Northern States	4,445	5,665	4,075
North Atlantic division	5,205	8,510	4,135
North Central division	3,550	3,005	3,715
Western division	6,410	7,645	6,050

Here there is a marked diversity between the different sections of the country. The children of native-born parents show about the same ratio of criminals in the North Atlantic and the North Central States; but the children of foreign parents show nearly three times as high a ratio in the North Atlantic States as in the North Central States. In every one of the North Atlantic States the showing is against the children of foreign parents; but in every one of the North Central States except Illinois and North Dakota the showing is in favor of the children of foreign-born parents. Of the Western States, five show against the native born and six against the foreign born.

The difference in the showing in different parts of the country is due to the character of the immigration. (See Table No. 2.) We can not compare the criminals with the adults of each country for the reason that the census does not so divide them, and it does not make very much difference as long as we compare foreign with foreign.

The following is the number of prisoners to each million of inhabitants of the same nationalities from the principal countries which send immigrants to this country: Mexico, 7,758; Italy, 3,047; Ireland, 2,970; England, 2,103; Hungary, 2,082; Scotland, 1,977; Canada, 1,611; Austria, 1,403; Germany, 1,061; Denmark, 852; Sweden, 730; Norway, 644; Bohemia, 304.

The result is, as will be seen from the two tables, that those States which have a large Irish and Italian immigration—Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, and New Jersey—show a high ratio of crime among the foreign-born immigrants, while those which have had a large proportion of Germans, Scandinavians, and Slavs, like Ohio, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Nevada, and the Dakotas, show a low ratio of criminality among the foreign immigrants.

Not only that, but in the States of the North Central division the foreign born show a ratio of crime only a little more than one-half as large among the foreign born as among the native born, and the result is to bring the average of crime in these States very low. I believe that it may be said truthfully that Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, North and South Dakota, and Nebraska have a smaller ratio of criminals to the population than any other territory of equal size or any other portion of equal numbers in the civilized world, and this immunity from crime is due to the high quality of the native and foreign immigration into these States, especially the foreign immigration.

I have no doubt that the excessive ratio of crime among the English-speaking immigrants is not due so much to the character of the nations from which they come as to the fact, of which there is uncontrovertible evidence, that known criminals have immigrated to America from those countries. I believe that the apparent decrease of crime in Great Britain is owing to this fact, in an appreciable measure.

The indiscriminate denunciation of foreign immigration is not only slanderous, but it is suicidal.

It will be easy for any experienced student of statistics to verify the figures which I present in the inclosed table.

I shall take pleasure in furnishing any additional information on request.

I am, Senator, yours, with high respect.

H. H. HART, Secretary.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
Washington, D. C.

No. 2.—Total foreign-born inhabitants and foreign-born prisoners in the United States, 1890, distributed according to country of birth—Continued.

This extract shows how dangerously figures can be used to bolster up a preconceived theory. Of course, sir, if all the non-criminals, as children, are added to the native column of population, and all the children excluded from the foreign column of population, and the percentage of criminals calculated from the columns so made up, a much smaller percentage will show for the native column and a much larger for the foreign column than the true facts would warrant.

I also introduce, in this connection, an article from the New York Mail and Express, by "A Student of Immigration," which contains valuable information in regard to crime among immigrants.

IMMIGRATION LAWS ARE STRICT ENOUGH.

To the Editor of the Mail and Express.

SIR: We believe that the immigration laws of the United States as at present executed are entirely sufficient to protect the interests of the people. This position has been reiterated by successive Superintendents and Commissioners-General of Immigration, and by the different commissioners of immigration. The enemies of foreign immigration, led by the Immigration Restriction League, of Boston, propose an educational test as a measure of restriction. Yet, while illiteracy is a disadvantage, it is well known that it does not produce and develop the essentials of character.

The qualities that make a man a valuable member of the community—his industry and perseverance, his thrift, honesty, sobriety, fair dealing, etc.—are entirely independent of his ability to read and write. We need the productive power of human labor to develop the boundless resources of this country. We require strong arms and willing hands to do the work of drudgery in mining and milling. It is well known that native Americans are not inclined to perform hard physical labor. Formerly the Irish were depended upon to work mines, construct railroads, dig sewers, and for other branches of unskilled labor, but nowadays the Irishman is seldom willing to take such places. The Italians and men of other races who are now employed do not supplant the Irish; they only fill the places left vacant by the Irish.

No one will deny that England's supremacy in the industrial world has been due to cheap iron and cheap coal, produced by labor, of which a plentiful supply has been at hand at all times. The United States possesses all natural conditions to rival and excel Great Britain in iron and coal production. Its competition is already seriously felt in England. The United States has a greater area of coal fields than any other country in the world, and produces more iron ore and pig iron than any other country. The total value of mineral products of the United States was, in 1894, $581,000,000, and in 1895, $678,000,000. Its possibilities of development are simply tremendous, but progress will be impossible if we say that the man who is ready to come here and work in the coal mines and iron mills shall not come.

If we do this, the whole industrial development of the country will be arrested. With the propensity of human nature to see the mote in other people's eyes and not the beam in our own, Americans have only words of censure and pity for European nations that maintain large standing armies, and thereby withdraw hundreds of thousands of men from the productive power of the country.

Mr. Edward Atkinson, of Boston, in a recent letter to the Evening Post, severely criticised the condition of Germany in this respect. In answer to this I think it may be said with justice that the standing army of Germany, required by the condition of European international relations, does not cost that country by far as much as the pension roll does the United States, and that the money expended for a standing army is well spent in teaching young men in the early years of their manhood discipline, cleanliness, orderliness, and obedience, and giving them for a year or two daily drill and bodily exercise—a schooling which is doubtless of inestimable value in after life.

We do not need to argue the point that military service withdraws so many able-bodied men from the productive power of a country; this truth is self-evident, and for that reason it is illogical and shortsighted to contend that the productive power of the able-bodied immigrants should be kept out of this country, which to a large extent would be the consequence of the educational test now again proposed in Congress.

The arguments of the Immigration Restriction League are directed particularly against the immigration from southern and eastern Europe, which is declared to be so much worse than that from the other European countries that as a measure of salvation for the morality and industry of the country it must be prevented. The league charges that immigrants from Italy, Hungary, Russia, and Poland, being to a larger degree illiterate than those from other countries, are less desirable and "fill our prisons, almshouses, and charitable institutions."

Mr. Hall, the secretary of the Immigration Restriction League, repeats this charge in a letter addressed to the New York Tribune under date of December 22, 1897, referring particularly to the experience of Massachusetts. In the same letter he makes the statement that "there is a little fraud in the inspection of immigrants." It is for the immigration authorities to refute this gratuitous fling at their efficiency and honesty of purpose, but every one who has dealings with them knows how painstaking, careful, and rigid they are in the execution of the immigration-inspection laws.

If we now examine the arraignment of the immigrants from eastern and southern Europe, quoted above, we find that the charge of the greater degree of their criminality, insanity, and pauperism, when compared with the people from other parts of Europe, is unfounded. The official report of the Massachusetts State prison for 1893 states that there were 140 commitments, of which 35 were of persons of European birth, and Great Britain and Ireland contributed 24 of these, France 3, Germany 1, Sweden 1, Finland 1, Italy

4, Austria 1, and Russia and Poland none, so that the countries complained of furnished less than 15 per cent of the commitments of people of foreign birth, while during that year and for several years previous these same countries contributed about 40 per cent of the total immigration.

On the other hand, Great Britain and Ireland supplied over 68 per cent of the commitments. Does this not plainly show that the league is on the wrong track, and that it is absolutely false if the secretary of the league, Mr. Hall, says in his letter that "there is an exact and parallel progression between the percentage of illiteracy among immigrants and the number of criminals furnished by the same nationalities to the prisons of Massachusetts"? The illiteracy among immigrants from Italy, Austria-Hungary, Russia, and Poland is about seven times as large as among immigrants from Great Britain and Ireland!

The Massachusetts State Reformatory for the same year reports 185 commitments, and in respect to the nativity of prisoners there were from Austria 2, Great Britain and Ireland 73, Germany 7, Italy 2, Norway and Sweden 6, Poland 2, and Russia 5, or 11 out of 97 of foreign birth from Austria, Italy, Russia, and Poland, or commitments from Austria, Italy, Russia, and Poland 11 per cent; illiteracy among immigrants from Russia and Poland between 19.62 and 50.94 per cent; commitments from Great Britain and Ireland 75 per cent; illiteracy among immigrants from Great Britain and Ireland between 2.64 and 8.57 per cent.

In the face of these figures the contention of the league against the south and east of Europe appears ridiculous.

The commitments for the same year to the Boston House of Industry showed 1,966 from Great Britain and Ireland, 3 from France, 29 from Germany, 63 from Sweden and Norway, 14 from Italy, 5 from Russia, 4 from Finland, 2 from Poland, and 1 from Austria; or commitments from Austria, Italy, Russia, and Poland a little over 1 per cent; average illiteracy from Austria, Italy, Russia, and Poland 37 per cent; commitments from Great Britain and Ireland over 94 per cent; average illiteracy from Great Britain and Ireland 5½ per cent.

Comment appears unnecessary.

If we now take all jails and houses of correction in Massachusetts for the year 1893, with the exception of those given above, we find 4,089 prisoners of British and Irish nativity, 33 from France, 74 from Germany, 96 from Sweden and Norway, 84 from Italy, 52 from Russia, 31 from Finland, 29 from Poland, 8 from Austria, 4 from Hungary; or commitments from Austria-Hungary, Italy, Russia, and Poland, less than 4 per cent; average illiteracy from Austria-Hungary, Italy, Russia, and Poland, less than 37 per cent; commitments from Great Britain and Ireland, 90 per cent; average illiteracy from Great Britain and Ireland, 5.5 per cent.

Here again the people aimed at by the league make by far the best showing.

The statistics of the Massachusetts insane asylums are not quite so complete, but they are sufficient to illustrate the fallacy of the league's contention. During fourteen years previous to 1894, 20,990 cases have been admitted to the State lunatic hospitals, of which 8,889 were of British and Irish parentage, and from other countries 1,355. These figures do not give specific information in regard to the countries proscribed by the league, but as they can only form a part of the smaller number of 1,355, the league's assertion here also is untenable.

As the character of people is doubtless the same in Massachusetts as in other States, the results ascertained above will unquestionably hold good all over the country.

This bears out the contention that illiteracy is not a test for a man's character, and shows the absurdity of the statement that because an immigrant can not read nor write he is more likely to become a criminal, a pauper, or an insane person than if he could.

How little pauperism has to do with foreign immigration is shown by McMaster in his History of the People of the United States, volume 4, when, speaking of pauperism in 1820, he says that "paupers then were increasing more rapidly than population; one-seventh of the population of the city of New York actually lived on charity; and seven-eighths of them were reduced to abject poverty by the inordinate use of liquor."

That habitual drunkenness is one of the principal causes of criminality, pauperism, and insanity is a universally recognized fact, and it is just as well known that the vice of drunkenness is exceedingly rare among the races which the league seeks to exclude. If, therefore, the desirability of the immigrants is to be measured by the standards set up by the league, immigrants from the south and east of Europe should be received with open arms in this country, and welcomed as much from that point of view as they are appreciated by those who have the continued progress and unimpeded development of this country's industries at heart.

A STUDENT OF IMMIGRATION.

So, sir, from the foregoing statements and facts, it can be fairly argued—

First. That it is not shown that the illiterate immigrants, qualified under the present law, are dangerous or undesirable citizens. From the foundation of the Government until now such have been admitted. The country has progressed beyond all conjecture. Every class of society has advanced in wealth and morality. The burden of proof is on the proponents of this bill to establish their charges, which they have signally failed to do.

Second. It is not shown that illiterate immigration has produced more of the criminal classes. It may be asked, What is the standard of citizenship set up by the advocates of this measure? For it is first to be ascertained what kind and character of citizenship they establish before they can say what will or will not injure it. To say that illiteracy will in the future injure it, in the face of the fact that illiterates have heretofore been admitted without any appreciable deterioration of the standard, whatever it may be, is wholly untenable.

This bill is but the feeble echo of the nativism that was rampant in "Know-Nothing" times. The same clamor was raised against the Irish and the German as is now raised against the Italian. It is the cry of proscription and selfishness. It is another form of the mania of protection. It is repugnant to Democracy in its widest sense. It is a libel on 70,000,000 American freemen whose ancestors, as well as themselves, have welcomed to our shores every son and daughter of toil sprung from the great races from which we have sprung, whose grand mission it is to conquer and subdue this fertile continent and to build up and maintain a republic as strong and enduring as the granite in its mountains, and as comprehensive and liberal in its policy as the doctrines of the Divine Semite of Calvary.

Sir, perhaps the proponents of this bill will say that an illiterate Jew, of the race of Him who has founded a moral and a religious kingdom greater than this Republic, but filled with a spark of the genius of the Nazarene, strong of body as the fishermen who were His disciples, industrious as the wise king who built the temple wherein to worship Jehovah, is an undesirable immigrant. Wiser than our ancestors, as proscriptive as the doctors of the ancient Sanhedrim, they venture the first step in the march of patrician exclusiveness preparatory to the process of bringing us within the inclosure of a Mongolian wall.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 13, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6351) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899. I should like to reach an agreement, if possible, as to the time of debate. I would suggest that the time be limited to two hours, or two hours and a half at the utmost.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills, and, pending that, asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be limited to two hours.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I ask the gentleman, for information, whether that time has already been parceled out?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, sir.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I should like to have a little time myself. I have no objection to the limitation.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York to make that time a little longer. Hitherto I have parceled out all the time allowed to this side with a view of abbreviating things in the interest of the House. To-day I expect to occupy the attention of the House myself perhaps for half an hour. That would only leave half an hour for the balance of this side. I would ask the gentleman to make it an hour and a half on each side—make it three hours.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi that he take an hour and a half, and on our side we will be satisfied with half an hour.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Very well; that will be enough for us.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands there is no objection; and the question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HULL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 6351) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6351) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that general debate is limited to two hours, thirty minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from New York, and one hour and thirty minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask to have the report read in my time.

The report (by Mr. WADSWORTH) was read as follows:

The Committee on Agriculture, having had under consideration the estimates submitted as necessary for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, present the accompanying bill to the House and submit the following report:

The aggregate amount carried by this bill for the Department of Agriculture is $3,323,402. The amount appropriated for the current fiscal year was $3,187,902; so that the total amount for the fiscal year 1898-99 is $135,500 in excess of the amount for the current fiscal year. It is, however, $231,984 below the estimates.

Increases in the accompanying bill are itemized, as follows:

Continuing investigations as to agricultural resources and capabilities of Alaska	$5,000
Bureau of Animal Industry	100,000
Two additional clerks in Weather Bureau	3,000
General expenses, Weather Bureau	30,000
Other expenses, Weather Bureau	18,000
New building at Sault Ste. Marie, Weather Bureau	3,000
Total	159,000

Decreases in the accompanying bill are itemized as follows:

Division of Statistics	$10,000
Division of Fiber Investigations	5,000
Division of Gardens and Grounds	5,000
Library	1,000
Museum	1,500
Postage	1,000
Total		23,500
Making a net increase of		135,500

The rapidity with which the population of Alaska is increasing and the general interest evinced by the whole country in this Territory is believed to fully warrant the increase of $5,000 hereby granted for the purpose of investigating its agricultural resources and capabilities.

The constantly growing demand for microscopic and other inspections of meats and meat products for export necessitates the increase of $100,000 to enable the Bureau of Animal Industry to comply with these demands, which have grown beyond all expectation. Some foreign governments will not receive our meats without the brand or certificate of official inspection, and it is therefore absolutely necessary that this work be continued and extended, or the foreign market for our meat and meat products will be speedily lost.

The total increase in the amount provided in this bill for the Weather Bureau is $51,000. This increase is due to the proposed establishment of new weather stations, with the customary observers, instruments, etc., and the establishment of these new stations so increases the work of the central office at Washington that the employment of two additional clerks at said central office becomes necessary, and $3,000 is appropriated by this bill for their salaries.

Three thousand dollars are provided by this bill for the erection of a building for a weather station at Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., where the Government now owns the site and most of the necessary material, so that the small amount hereby appropriated is chiefly for labor.

The Government is now paying $360 per annum rental for a building which is not only inadequate for the needs of the weather service, but is very inconveniently located; and it is proposed to erect the new building on a Government reservation immediately on the bank of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, where the reports and warnings of the Weather Bureau will be most accessible to the marine interests of the lakes.

The decreases in this bill have been agreed upon because, after careful investigation, the committee are convinced that the amounts herein provided are amply sufficient to properly and efficiently carry on the work of the Department.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to make any further remarks at the present. I reserve the balance of my time, and yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, we are now in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of discussing the agricultural appropriation bill. I take it, therefore, that it is perfectly fair to discuss anything which in the opinion of the Chair and in my opinion is for the general interest of the agricultural class. I shall therefore take much of the time which is allotted to me for the purpose of discussing a postal savings-bank system for the benefit of the agricultural interests.

I have been long desirous, Mr. Chairman, of seeing the establishment in this country of a system of postal savings banks. That desire has been based upon every consideration of convenience to the citizen and economy for the Government. I have yet to hear one single argument against its expediency and sound wisdom which is not an argument based upon some antagonistic individual or class interest. The trouble with me for a long time was the fact that I entertained a doubt, and a very serious doubt, of the constitutionality of any measure of the sort. I am still one of those old-fashioned people who think that the oath of a member of Congress or Senator is as sacred as any other oath registered in the chancels of heaven or in the forum of one's conscience.

I am not one of those who believe that there can, under any circumstances, be any "higher law" than the Constitution of the United States for a Senator or a Representative in Congress, who has taken an oath to observe that Constitution. I am still one of those who believe that the pretense of "obedience to a higher law" by a representative of the people in violation of the Constitution is simply a euphemistic way of explaining the fact of perjury on the part of the man who resorts to it. I entered, therefore, into the investigation of the constitutionality of some postal savings bank system with every desire to find a constitutional warrant for the system, but with every determination at the same time to oppose it, however good and beneficial in itself, if I could find no constitutional warrant for it. I have finally come to the conclusion that such a system can be inaugurated in a constitutional way—a conclusion perfectly satisfactory to my own mind and my own conscience. My method of arriving at it has been about what I am now here going to state.

The United States Government undoubtedly has a right to contract debt for carrying on war or for any other purpose within the sphere of the powers given it by the States. Such a debt has been contracted and exists to-day, and the Government has issued evidences of its indebtedness—some interest bearing and some noninterest bearing. The Government has an undoubted constitutional right to refund this debt, and it has a right to do anything which, as an incident to the refunding, is necessary or proper and not in itself violative in letter or in spirit of any of the reserved rights of the States or of the people of the States, respectively. If, therefore, a postal savings bank scheme can be so constituted and inaugurated as to form a part of a refunding scheme in the interest of the people and of the Government, it would be subject to no greater objection than any other method of refunding.

My plan, therefore, of establishing postal savings banks is to permit the citizens of the several States to deposit in the post-offices of the United States any amount of money desired to be deposited, and when so much as $5 shall have been deposited by any one depositor to issue him a bond of the United States, payable on demand and bearing interest at the rate of, say, 2 per cent. Upon any higher deposit than $5, in multiples of $5, to issue a bond or bonds, payable on demand, in multiples of $5, to the depositor, and taking the money thus deposited, after forwarding it to the proper place and authority fixed by the bill, and setting aside out of the moneys thus deposited a sum of, say, 25 per cent as a reserve fund to meet demands of depositors, to take the other 75 per cent of the money coming from this source and with it redeem or purchase bonds of the United States now outstanding at 3, 3½, 4, and 4½ per cent. Thus the bonded debt of the United States would be gradually refunded at a rate of interest not exceeding 2 per cent, while at the same time the people would be furnished a safe deposit and a temporary investment for small sums.

I would place the rate of interest at 2 per cent rather than 2½ per cent, because I think bonds for small amounts issued in the manner which I have described would readily float at 2 per cent. I count that another one-half of 1 per cent would be a margin for the payment of all of the expenses of the postal savings-bank system, thus leaving the depositors themselves to bear the burden of the expense of the system, inaugurated in the first instance, it is true, for the benefit of the Government for refunding its bonds, but incidentally accruing to the benefit of its depositors. Gentlemen may ask, what are you going to do when all of the United States bonds shall have been extinguished? My answer is that that time, if it should ever come, is so remotely distant that we may leave to the men of the day of its coming the task of working out the problem.

For myself, I do not apprehend that the day will ever come. This Government, as long as this is a people under one Government, will always have a bonded debt. It is the experience of nations, unluckily, that the debts of a previous war are never paid before new debts on account of new wars are contracted. And even were we to prove an exception to the rule which has controlled the destinies of all other peoples of European race, we would find at all times in the arts of peace abundant reasons for the expenditure of money in ways necessary and unavoidable for carrying out and executing the purposes of the Federal Government under our Constitution. For example, the Government is paying every year, for rents on buildings to be used for post-offices and other purposes, a sum amounting to much more than 2 per cent upon the sum which would be requisite to construct and own buildings for those purposes.

Again, while the free-delivery system has been developed to the highest point of efficiency in the large cities, people in the rural districts are still compelled to spare a man and a horse out of the field to go to and return a distance of 3, 6, 8, and sometimes in my country as much as 12 miles. Going for the mail, in fact, most frequently means practically the loss of a man and a horse half a day or a whole day out of the crop.

It is our habit in this great Republic to boast much of ourselves and to look down with an amusing degree of contempt upon the "effete peoples of Europe," and yet the "effete peoples of Europe" have never perpetrated on the residents of their rural districts the glaring discriminations which we daily practice upon those of ours, and which we do not seem to regard as even remediable.

The extension of the rural free-delivery system, therefore, would bring a profit to the producing classes of this country, and especially to those engaged in the very basic art of production—agriculture—which would be worth more to the country and to them than the 2½ per cent interest and expense which would be involved in the postal savings-bank system and necessitated by it. Thus, while the Government pays the depositor 2 per cent, and it costs not over one-half per cent to maintain the system, a much greater return would be made by the use of the money in refunding bonds, or in stopping rent, or in extending free delivery than the amount of interest paid out to the depositors on the new bonds and the expense of administration would come to. Having said this much, I wish to say a few words generally about the effect of a postal savings-bank system.

It has been urged that it would drain the extremities of the country and that all of the ready money otherwise accumulating in them would go to the financial centers. One of the reasons why I advocate the bill is that it would in my opinion do exactly the opposite, provided the evidences of indebtedness to the depositor were in the shape of bonds payable on demand to the depositor or his order in denominations of $5 and multiples of $5 up to and not exceeding $100. It would cause, on the contrary, a saving and accumulation of savings at the very homes of the people. It is true that the money itself would go in the first instance on to Washington and the subtreasuries, but it is also true that the bonded evidences of indebtedness would remain in the hands of the depositors, with the power inherent in them at any moment of drawing out of the Treasury of the United States for purposes of local investment the sums represented by them—in short, would retain the potency of money and would be potentially in circulation.

To one who has considered the matter carefully, it is evident that in a majority of cases the holder of these bonds for small amounts, if forced by unexpected expenditures or necessities or tempted by investment to make use of them, would not go to the trouble of going to the post-office to make demand for the actual money, but would pass the bond on in liquidation of debt or in purchase of goods as an extinguishment satisfactory to both parties. Again, while the actual money deposited would be sent by the Government to its safety deposit centers, 75 per cent of it would be immediately used in purchasing or redeeming outstanding bonds of the Government, thus getting back to that extent even the actual money itself into the channels of trade and production.

One of the reasons why I favor the system is that it would have the effect ultimately, and in my opinion much sooner than anyone now imagines, of extinguishing, so far as Government liability is concerned, all of the outstanding bonds of the United States upon which national banks now issue notes as a basis, and therefore of abolishing, gradually, perhaps, but certainly, the present national banking system itself.

The Congress of the United States instituted the national banking system itself as a "credit strengthening" institution, because it is a matter of history that the main purpose of the system was to furnish a demand for United States bonds to such an extent as to enable the Government to float those bonds at par. It is nothing but fair then that a better "credit strengthening" institution should render them useless as a fiscal agency. If there is any constitutional warrant upon the part of the Federal Government for establishing banks of issuance except this ground of strengthening its credit, any reason which would be satisfactory to anybody in the world sincerely attempting to obey the Federal Constitution, to anybody except a Federalist or a Federalistic judge, or somebody a direct political descendant of that class of people, I do not know what it is. It seems to me that a postal savings bank system founded upon the refunding of the debt and upon the issuance of demand bonds at a low rate of interest in small amounts would have a very great tendency to produce in this country a thing which is very much needed, namely, a flexible currency, responding automatically to trade necessities.

In ordinary times, when the citizen was comparatively prosperous and necessities were not weighing heavily upon him, he would treat his bonds up to a certain amount (beyond which other investments would be more profitable) as bonds, and they would be out of circulation. In times of panic and trouble, when banks were refusing to honor the checks of their own depositors and when no collateral deposit could effect a loan, these small bonds would pass readily from hand to hand, being then practically in circulation as money and doing the work of money in the extinguishment of debts and the payment of small bills for small purchases. Whenever the bonds would be used and received as a part of the debt-extinguishing, goods-buying, circulating medium, the person so using them would necessarily lose interest for a quarter (or for a month, if the interest were payable monthly) on the bonds. He would therefore not so use them except in case of necessity where the immediate control of the face value of the bond for an exigent purpose would be of more value to him than the expectation of the interest.

Thus while these bonds in the ordinary times would remain locked up amongst the valuable papers of the holders, in times of absolute necessity they would furnish a medium for clearances among the people, the holder either using them as money without presentation for payment or presenting them at his post-office to obtain money, with the absolute assurance that the "bank" to which he was carrying them, if bank it might be called (a bank only in name), was a bank that would not put off its depositors for a single day. The very assurance that this was true would prevent at all times a run upon the Government, for people who engage in runs upon places of deposit for the most part do so because of lack of confidence.

Mr. STEELE. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman, but I should be glad to ask one or two questions. In the first place, what assurance is there that a 2 per cent rate of interest would be satisfactory to depositors, and that these postal savings bonds could be floated? Again, what would be the effect of such a measure in little business communities, such as the town where I reside, having a population of 20,000? We have there three small banks, the deposits in which aggregate probably something over a million and a half of dollars. This amount is substantially made up of the deposits of laboring men; there are no large deposits whatever. Now, the money aggregated in those banks is the capital on which we do business in that community. We have sixty-seven factories, all of them borrowers of money on which to do business. Those factories in turn employ laborers. Now, if the money which the gentleman proposes shall go into these savings banks should in this way be diverted from the lines of business in which it is now employed in such a community as ours, will not our factories have to seek financial accommodation at the points to which the money has been taken? And might not this have the effect largely of breaking up the manufacturing industries in our small communities? How does the gentleman propose to overcome that objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I take pleasure in replying to my friend from Indiana. Responding to his first question first, as to what makes me think that these bonds would float at par, I will say——

Mr. STEELE. I ought to have stated that in my community people can obtain 3 per cent on their deposits.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The noninterest-bearing debt of the United States is floating at par every day, and the interest-bearing debt of the United States at 2 per cent would freely float as currency, provided it were in small sums, so as to be capable of being used as money. In cases of emergency there would be exactly the same reason why it should float at par as for the noninterest-bearing debt now floating, with the additional reason of the 2 per cent interest.

Now, replying to the gentleman's other question as to the probable effect of this measure on the ordinary savings-deposit banks, my reply is that if the gentleman's constituents prefer to deposit their money with such institutions at 3 or 3½ per cent, rather than with the United States Government at 2 per cent, they would continue to do business in that way. The old principle of the survival of the fittest would operate. If the savings bank run by private individuals were the fittest, it would survive. On the other hand, if the people preferred to take 2 per cent from the Government with absolute safety, rather than 3 or 3½ per cent with the problematic safety of a private institution, such private institutions would go by the board. While this might be unfortunate for the bankers or other persons engaged in that line of business, and would therefore be an incident to be deplored, still the effect would operate to the general interest of the people, and would happen in a perfectly scientific way as a demonstration of the fact that it was to the general interest of the people. If the private institutions were fit to survive, they would survive; if unfit by comparison with the Government depositaries to survive, they would not.

Now, my own private opinion is that in the thickly settled parts of the Northeast, where there is, comparatively speaking, a great deal of money in use, the private savings banks would still continue to do a very profitable business, and would be very little injured by the postal savings-bank system of the Government. One would supplement the other. And in connection with that I will say to the gentleman that it has been shown by the experience of other countries where postal savings banks have been established that such is the result.

Another thing to which I will call the gentleman's attention is the fact that the establishment of this system would contemplate only the receiving of deposits up to a certain fixed sum—say $1,000 or $2,000 from any one depositor. Sums above that would not be deposited, because they could not be received. There are a number of people who deposit very much larger sums, and therefore they would not resort to these postal savings banks for their deposits.

It is also true that, while it would be desirable as an investment in small sums up to a certain amount, when it got beyond that amount other investments would be more profitable. The man with $1,000 or $2,000 to invest would find that it was possibly more profitable and more desirable for him to put that amount, instead of investing it in the postal savings bank, into a home to be bought or built, or other property of that sort, or, in the section of country in which the gentleman lives, in the very factories of which he speaks.

Mr. STEELE. I do not think that the gentleman has quite answered the question which I propounded, so far as drawing the money from the smaller to the greater centers of population, where there might be national depositories. That, it seems to me, would be a very serious objection to this plan.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. In the sparsely settled districts of the country—in my own part of the country, for instance—where there are no savings banks, and where the banks take the deposits of people who own the money and pay no interest to them, the people would adopt the system of using in their business the safe depositories of the postal establishment until the bankers had been able to provide some other source for them, where the deposits might be made on equally good terms.

Mr. ADAMS. How do you propose that the Government shall invest the savings which are deposited in these banks?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I said that I proposed that the Government, instead of issuing certificates of deposit, as ordinary banks do, should issue bonds in sums of $5 or multiples of $5, payable on demand and bearing 2 per cent interest. In that case the depositor would bring the bond up like any certificate of deposit, present it, draw his check, and get his money with the interest accumulated.

Now, 25 per cent of the amount would be held as a reserve to answer all demands upon the banks. The banking history of the country shows that to be a sufficient reserve. Twenty per cent is generally accounted to be a safe and sufficient reserve. In the case of the Government of the United States it would be a fortiori ample, and more than ample, for the reason that the depositor in these postal banks would know that his deposits would be absolutely safe, and that he would not have to wait for his pay twenty-four hours. Confidence is three-fourths of the function that is required in successful banking. If a man is aware of the fact that he could get his money whenever he wants it, it gives him a confidence that nothing else can bestow. It is the same as that exhibited by the Irishman when he came to the bank counter—understanding that there was a run on the bank—and demanded his money. The cashier handed it out to him. He said in all seriousness, "And faith, can you pay me?" The cashier said, "Certainly; every dollar of it." The Irishman said, "Then it is meself that don't want it. I came to get it because I was told that you could not pay."

Mr. ADAMS. I do not think, perhaps, that I have made my question clear. The gentleman has not answered it. I desire to know how the Government is to invest the fund so as to obtain the 2 per cent to be paid upon the deposits? In other words, how shall you use all the money that will flow into the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I now understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. ADAMS (continuing). After the Government has repaid in the operation of this system the amount of its outstanding loans, how may the surplus be profitably invested?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The United States Government has now outstanding a vast amount of indebtedness, with interest running at 3 to 3½ and 4 and 4½ per cent.

Mr. ADAMS. That is correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. They can use the money which will come from the safety deposit banks in the issuance of 2 per cent bonds for the purpose of purchasing and redeeming the outstanding bonds——

Mr. ADAMS. But we are legislating now for all time. The Government loan will be paid off after a while. What will the gentleman recommend to be done with these deposits after the Government loan shall have been extinguished?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I have tried to answer the gentleman's question, but it is enough to say that I do not believe the time will ever come in the history of this country when the Government loan will be entirely paid off.

Mr. ADAMS. I am more hopeful than the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And I have the historical example and experience of all the other peoples of the Caucasian race against you. There is no government of white people on the face of the earth that has not been expecting for a half century to pay off its public indebtedness. But the result has always been the same. Instead of reducing the debt, in most cases it has been increased by reason of unexpected wars or other complications. As a matter of fact, none of them has ever been extinguished.

Mr. ADAMS. Permit me a moment. You have quoted other nations as not paying off the public debt. But that does not apply to us. We have paid two-thirds of it inside of thirty years——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi (interrupting). And increased it during the last three and a half years by $262,000,000, in a time of profound peace.

Mr. ADAMS. And the whole of it would have been paid off before now if the policy of the Republican party had not been interrupted.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I have answered the question of the gentleman by saying that if at any time the national interest-bearing debt of the Government could be extinguished there would still remain abundant opportunities for the expenditure of money for purposes not only proper and right under the Constitution, but absolutely necessary to carry on the Government itself; where it would pay the Government to continue to use the money and pay 2 per cent for it rather than to indulge in other expenditures of money wrung from the people by taxation which would necessarily take place if this course were not adopted.

Mr. ADAMS. And tax the people to pay the interest?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No; not anew nor in so large an amount as now. The people are now being taxed, if the gentleman will excuse me, for the purpose of paying an immense amount of money every year for interest on 3, 3½, 4, and 4½ per cent bonds, and for the rent of buildings for post-offices, custom-houses, and I know not what else, as well as in the shape of useless loss of valuable time in going for the mail. The amount of money which the Government pays annually for rental purposes is much more than 2 per cent upon the sum which would be necessary to construct and own those buildings at every little town in the United States. So that it would be money in the pocket of the Government——

Mr. ADAMS. Then you propose, instead of this Government paying its running expenses by taxation from year to year, to incur a debt that is to roll up indefinitely and never be liquidated?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, no.

Mr. ADAMS. That is your proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I do not think that is a fair inference.

Mr. ADAMS. You say you are to keep on receiving deposits from the people of the United States, and instead of paying the rent of buildings and other such expenses of the Government, that these deposits are to be taken and spent. You have got to pay at some time, and you will either roll up a permanent debt, increasing year by year, or you will have to tax the people in order to pay it all. I am asking for information now. I am not antagonizing the thing.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the fallacy underlying the question propounded by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is this: He seems to think that whenever a dollar is deposited with the United States Government that it will continue forever to be so deposited. After you reach a certain amount, the experience of all countries, like the experience of all banks, is that the deposit remains substantially the same. The amount of deposits does not continue to increase except——

Mr. ADAMS. Why, my dear sir, the deposits of the United States have increased millions of dollars.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Please allow me to finish my sentence.

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It does not continue to increase except in the proportion in which the population and wealth of the country increase; but deposits are being withdrawn all the time, while new deposits are being made. So that there is no fear of there being some great "indefinite" sum deposited in the Treasury of the United States. The experience of other nations shows that a certain sum constitutes a normal and natural amount, not much beyond which and not much under which will the deposits in the Government safety banks go.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. May I ask the gentleman a question for information?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. In addition to the investment in Government bonds, what would you say to the investment of the money in State, county, and municipal bonds?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I should prefer not to discuss that. It seems to me that the investment in Government bonds which are now drawing a higher rate of interest, the investment in public buildings necessary for carrying on the business of the Government, the investment in the extension of the free delivery system to the people in the country, who are entitled to exactly the same rights as the people in the cities, will settle this question of what to do with the money for so long that we can leave new questions subsequently to arise to our grandchildren.

Mr. GREENE. May I ask the gentleman a question? Suppose the Government of the United States should invest the money that they receive in this way in State, county, and municipal bonds. Do you not think they could so invest it and double the interest that they pay to depositors?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I think it is very probable, but as an "old-line," State-rights Democrat, I am, at the first blush, very much opposed to mixing up the National Government with State bonded indebtedness and all that. I think it would give rise to difficulties of a political character which would far exceed any financial benefit.

Mr. GREENE. Do you not think that the Government can loan money—that it has a right to loan it?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It can loan money when it does it for the purpose of carrying out or exercising some constitutional function. It can not loan money per se, i. e., for its own sake.

Mr. GREENE. It did loan a large amount of money to the Union Pacific Railway Company, did it not?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I think so, and I think it did a great wrong when it did it. Now, Mr. Chairman, to proceed. I think that one of the strongest features to recommend the system would be the fact, as some one has said, that "it would prevent stringency from too limited ordinary banking facilities in sparsely settled sections of the country." I mean that that is one of the greatest financial reasons recommending it.

There are moral reasons which (its constitutionality being once allowed) transcend all other considerations and to my mind make the advisability of the system great beyond all challenge for the man who would improve, educate, elevate, and develop his kind. These moral reasons are that it would encourage thrift by giving absolute security for savings, and in encouraging thrift it would encourage the virtues which underlie thrift—self-denial, temperance, industry.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. What rate of interest would your bill give?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Two per cent; and as it will involve an expense of half of 1 per cent to administer the law, there would be a total expense to the Government of 2½ per cent.

It would, in the next place, encourage patriotism, because it would make the people themselves the bondholders of the country, thus fostering in the mind of the humblest depositor a feeling of personal interest in the prosperity of his country, the sacred maintenance of its laws, and the perpetuity of its institutions. While it encouraged patriotism on the one hand by making the people the holders of the bonds of the Government, it would destroy on the other hand the powers for mischief now residing in a limited number who hold the bonds as a segregated class and curse the people and despise the institutions of the country in which they live.

It would not only have the effect which I have described of encouraging thrift and a feeling of personal interest in the welfare of the country upon the part of adults, but it would educate the children in the old-fashioned virtues of frugality and economy.

Moreover, it is a truth worthy of being always remembered that a feeling of independence which grows from the habit of putting aside something for a rainy day makes the citizen self-respecting, and, in case of necessity, self-asserting. He will be more apt to vote as he pleases without fear of coercion, and without temptation of corruption.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time and thank the House very kindly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yielded fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, my text this afternoon is "seed." I have been honored with a great many communications about seeds, some of them signed and several of them unsigned. I had a letter yesterday from a seed dealer in my own State, in which he broadly intimated that members of Congress were interested in this seed business for the purpose of "buying the votes of farmers." He very clearly intimated that in the letter. And I have here three anonymous postal cards, which I intend to read for the edification of the House, as bearing upon my text.

Mr. GREENE and others. We have all got them.

Mr. HENDERSON. Here is number one:

Free seeds keep Congressman in touch with his constituents.

"Congressman in touch"—that is in quotations. That would seem to be quoted, probably from some of us.

It goes on:

Why not let up on seeds for a while and send jackknives? Everybody could use them, and there would not be so much waste.

In that case, radish seeds would not come up poor turnips, and the Congressman would be saved much ridicule which he now often gets.

That is postmarked "Washington," and I am not honored with the signature of the writer.

Here is another specimen:

If the farmer must be made an object of charity, do not do it with "free seeds," but send him a hand organ and monkey—and start him in the business right.

Good government is treating all of its subjects alike. That kills the "free seeds" idea completely.

This is postmarked "Philadelphia," and is unsigned.

Here is number three:

John's influence can't be got with 15 cents' worth of "free seeds," but if you'll send me a box of hairpins, I'll look after him.

HIS WIFE.

P. S.—I'd rather not have crooked ones.

Mr. STEELE. How is that postmarked?

Mr. HENDERSON. This is postmarked "Washington;" one postmarked "Philadelphia" and one postmarked "Washington."

Who is sending these postal cards to members of Congress? I find that I am not the only one honored with these communications, but other gentlemen here seem to be recipients of the same kind of cards.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HENDERSON. Oh, certainly.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Did you send the hairpins?

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not that kind of a hairpin. [Laughter.]

Who are sending these insulting cards to the American Congress? Not one of them comes from farmers, because their interests are not that way. They must come from some one interested in prejudicing our minds against the distribution of seeds; and I know of no one interested but dealers in seeds. Therefore, I believe that these are a part of the seed dealer's programme to affect our minds against seed distribution. Whoever they came from, they came from small, contemptible, mean people, who did not know how to present a question to men with fairly disposed minds. Now, I want to say this about the seed business and our buying up the farmer vote with seed. The fellow that makes that charge is an ass. "I say that measuring my words," to use an often-used expression.

Now, we get, I believe, 6,000 packages of seeds. I have 9 counties, with over 200,000 people, in my district. I can not give a package of seed to 1 in 50 in my district. Personally I am not interested in the seed distribution as a politician, and that is what they are hinting at with respect to you and me. Why? I send my seeds addressed directly to farmers. In doing this I try to distribute them in equal proportion among the counties of my district and without respect to politics. John Smith gets a package of seed from Representative HENDERSON, and John Jones has an adjoining farm. John Smith tells him about the package of seeds he got from Mr. HENDERSON. John Jones says: "Well, I know I am as good a man as Smith, and I have not got a package of seed. I will just keep this thing in mind for Mr. HENDERSON."

He feels hurt; he feels offended; and the same is true of the agricultural reports. We do the best we can to carry out the law, but we can not get around among our constituents. I have repeatedly bought at the bookstores as high as 1,500 additional agricultural reports, paying 10 and 12 cents apiece for them, and once as high as 15 cents, and I believe they cost about 65 cents. I have done the best I could to distribute them equitably among my people, but I can not get round. I have wounded the feelings of many a good farmer in my district because I could not reach him. The interest of each member of Congress on this floor is against seed distribution and against the distribution of agricultural reports if he is to look solely at his own individual interest. But I say that privileges once given to the people, once enjoyed by them, are dangerous things to take away from them.

In the establishment of post-offices and the mail routes, I say to the Department, "Be very wise and careful in establishing new ones, but be doubly careful in wiping out a post-office or a mail route that the people have once had the privilege of enjoying." The farmers have for years been accustomed to the distribution of seeds. My experience has taught me to reserve quite a large number of my seeds for subsequent calls, for when they are distributed, John Jones, who, unlike John Smith, did not receive a package, writes asking for seeds. I send them until they are all exhausted, and then I play the prayerful part on the Agricultural Department, and refer the applications to them until they say, "Mr. HENDERSON, we can not fill any more orders for you." Then I go to Lowdermilk's secondhand store—I do not know where he gets them—but I buy enough to fill the orders. I make it a rule that a thing asked for is wanted and does more good than a thing not asked for.

Now, I say that those who think that the gentlemen on this floor are interested in the seed distribution are talking about something they know nothing about. They do their own intelligence an injustice. We have the labor of it, the care of it, the work, and the cursing—if I may use that elegant Boston term—from the men who do not get the package of seeds.

Whether it was a wise policy or not originally I am not prepared to say. I have thought, from my observation of it, that the distribution of seeds was a good thing, and for this reason: Having been an agriculturist myself, I am often invited to speak at county fairs in my district. I have been taken by the farmers around there through the buildings—the honorable gentleman from Brooklyn [Mr. FISCHER] will not smile at my remark; these gentlemen with soft, velvety hands must not question the integrity of my remarks when I say that I have been a farmer—I say they take me around and show me the different things produced from seeds that have been received through my hands. I remember, in Bremer County, I was at one of these fairs, and a man came and said, "Mr. HENDERSON, I want you to come with me into this building." He took me in and showed me, not a melon, nor a squash, nor a pumpkin; it came nearer being a rutabaga, but it was larger than a half bushel, a great big vegetable to feed stock with. He told me that there never had been seen or heard anything like that in Bremer County until he got those seeds from me. I did not know what I was sending him; I sent him what I got. I have had various kinds of vegetables pointed out to me from time to time that had never been seen nor heard of in that part of Iowa before. If the work is faithfully done by the Agricultural Department, if the theory of seed distribution is carried out, which is to send to one part of the United States seeds from another part, and make them interchangeable, I believe good results will follow.
